The sugar cost in this country is not the expense that cries most loudly for attention. Anyone who cares to examine this question for himself can readily see, from page 18 of the report made by the sugar investigating committee (H. Rept. No. 331, 2d sess. 62d Cong.), that the American people get refined sugar at wholesale—and the wholesale price is the real test in tariff matters—cheaper in terms of money than the people of any other great nation except England. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will insert as a part of my remarks the table given in the report of the sugar investigating committee, giving the wholesale prices of sugar in the five great nations and showing that England's price is 4.1 cents, approximately, and our price is 4.97 cents wholesale. I give the wholesale prices, because it is not fair in a tariff discussion to bring in the local and peculiar conditions that affect retail prices:

Year 1910, average quotations, net cash, in cents per pound.

WHOLESALE REFINED, TAX PAID.

England	4.101
Germany	5.150
Austria	7.298
United States	4.972

In the year 1910, the last available year, the American got his sugar for an average price of about nine-tenths of a cent more than the English consumer paid. Now, gentlemen will say, why should not the American have the cheapest sugar? I contend that he does have the cheapest sugar on earth when all conditions are taken into account. In proving to you that the American enjoys the cheapest sugar on earth, I want to call your attention to a very interesting document (S. Doc. No. 38, 62d Cong., 1st sess.), containing a report put out by the British Board of Trade. They made an investigation of conditions in this country and in England. It was part of a wide series of investigations, undertaken to determine the economic condition of England with reference to competitor nations, and that investigation carries in every line of it evidence of its truthfulness. It shows that the average family of a laboring man in America uses 5¼ pounds of sugar a week. You will have glowing pictures painted to you of the total saving to the American people on the sugar we consume. I submit to this House that the only true criterion is the amount of sugar consumed directly in the average family. This 5¼ pounds of sugar a week is almost the same amount used by the English family. The figures are based on actual inquiries conducted in many cities. As a statement of the sugar situation as related to the family it is far more reliable than deductions made from dividing the total sugar production with the population of the Nation. Much sugar is used in manufacturing, in tobacco, soda water, candy, canned milk, and so forth; but in the problem of saving to the ultimate consumer it is not necessary to consider the sugar used in manufactures, unless we believe that the tobacco man, the soda-water man, and the candy man will pass along to the family the almost infinitesimal percentage which he may save on the plug of tobacco or the pound of candy.

Taking, then, 5¼ pounds of sugar, the weekly portion of an American family, how much does that sugar cost in the world's oldest and truest currency, the labor of the father of the family? The British Board of Trade has compared many kinds of American labor with many kinds of English labor. I believe it is the best and most impartial comparison we have. On pages 13 and 16 of the Senate document to which I have referred there is a comparison of wages and hours of labor. I will take the wages of the hod carrier as fairly illustrative of the difference between the two countries, because the hod carrier applies natural labor and not machine-aided labor. This comparison shows that the English hod carrier can earn the week's supply of sugar for his family by working 108 minutes, if he can buy at the wholesale prices cited by the Sugar Investigating Committee, and the American hod carrier can earn the week's sugar for his family, buying also at wholesale prices, in 45 minutes. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is, the week's sugar costs the American laborer 45 minutes and costs the English laborer 108 minutes. [Applause.] I have given wholesale prices because in a discussion it is not fair to charge to the tariff the profit that the retailer may take.

Based on retail prices in the two countries, as found in the board of trade investigation and at a different period of time, the Englishman works 102 minutes for his sugar, the American 53 minutes.

I have examined carefully, and I believe the difference between the incomes of hod carriers in this country and England is fairly expressive of the general difference in incomes, not only as to laborers, but as to professional men, clerks, and other employees in general. Where the Englishman earns a dollar the American earns $2.30.

A PENNY-WISE POLICY NOT DESIRABLE.

To take the duty off raw sugar is not to save the consumer in price in the long run.

Mr. OLMSTED. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I should like to ask him one question. Perhaps he can answer it. That is, whether the price of sugar is cheaper or dearer in this country to-day than it was during the short period when we had no tariff whatever on sugar?

Mr. HINDS. I am coming to that in a moment. Bearing continually in mind that our main object should be to give to the consumer, the man with a family, the maximum sugar with the minimum of labor cost, we must not in our legislation here adopt a penurious and pound-foolish policy. I am going to admit that theoretically gentlemen can show that this bill ought to save the consumers a cent or a cent and a third on a pound of sugar, but the whole history of sugar prices for the last 40 years negatives the idea that this theoretical saving will be an actual saving. The ultimate consumer is not concerned directly with the prices of raw sugar abroad, with differentials, or with parities. What concerns him is the concrete fact of the price of sugar at the store where he buys it. As we can not know the varying retail prices, our best guide in consulting the consumer's interest is the wholesale price of refined sugar, and the wholesale price of sugar in the last 40 years shows with a conclusiveness not to be denied by any fair man that something beside the tariff makes sugar cheap or dear to the consumer.

On page 44 of the testimony taken by the sugar investigating committee are given the average wholesale prices for each year from 1870 until 1909. What does this show?

That from 1870 to 1882, and there was no change in the tariff for those years, the price dropped from 13½ cents a pound to 9½ cents. Something besides the tariff affected the price of sugar in those years.

In 1883 the tariff was reduced by about half a cent a pound, and in the next seven years on this basis sugar oscillated between 7.8 cents a pound and 6.2 cents a pound, entirely negativing the idea that the tariff was a primary factor in the price, because the oscillation of the sugar was several times the change of tariff.

In 1890, from a tariff of 2.24 per pound, sugar became free, with a bounty of 2 cents a pound to encourage domestic production. Now, the effect of bounties has always been to reduce the price of sugar below a fair market price, and it is not surprising that the taking off of the duty and the adding of the bounty, too, should have made a substantial reduction in the price of sugar in 1890. I do not attempt to deny that a part of that was due to the taking off of the tariff, because I do not deny that such would be the immediate effect on the price of sugar. It is on the long run, of two, three, or four years, that I am arguing here. The advocates of this bill will not fail to point out that for the three years of free sugar the wholesale price was lowered, and that is true; but it is a curious fact that, when in 1894 an ad valorem duty of nearly a cent a pound was put on, the consumer for the next three years got sugar even cheaper than he got it under free sugar with a bounty. Evidently then something besides the tariff interests the consumer of sugar.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has quoted Mr. Dingley, of Maine, as speaking in 1890 in favor of free sugar. He did undoubtedly, if the gentleman so quotes him, but I have no doubt that Mr. Dingley in 1897 remembered the effect of putting on the 1 cent ad valorem duty in 1894, and that may explain why, when he made the bill for which he was responsible, he did not give free sugar, but put on a tariff of nearly one cent and three-quarters.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINDS. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. Has the gentleman any figures to show what effect the change in the tariff of 1890, the taking off of the duty and adding the bounty——

Mr. HINDS. I just said that the price of sugar fell at that time.

Mr. STERLING. That is not the question—then adding 1 cent a pound in 1894; will the gentleman state what effect it had on the American production of sugar?

Mr. HINDS. I do not remember the effect on the American production of sugar. I did not examine that in that connection. Something happened, because sugar was cheaper.

In 1897 the Dingley law raised the duty on sugar to about 1⅞ cents a pound, yet for the six years of the full Dingley tariff the wholesale price of sugar ranged only a fifth of a cent a pound over the average of the free-sugar years. Some great force other than the tariff was evidently working on the price of sugar.

In 1903 a 20 per cent reduction in Dingley rates was made on sugars from Cuba, yet in the next six years the price to the consumer was slightly higher than for the six years before the duty was reduced. Some condition other than tariff rates must have been operating on the price of sugar.

In 1909 the Payne tariff law, without changing the raw-sugar duty, reduced slightly the tariff on refined sugar, but last September the wholesale price of refined sugar in New York soared to 7¼ cents a pound, a price far above the average of any year for the last 20 years. Evidently something besides the tariff made that rise in price to the consumer.

THE SUGAR SUPPLY THE GREAT FACTOR.

That mysterious something that neutralized the tariff increase of 1894, that sent sugar prices skyward last September without any change of the duties, can be but one thing—the supply of sugar.

The supply, not the particular tariff rate, is the great thing to the consumer. And the real and important rises and falls in the price of sugar are brought about by the supply. Last September it was believed in Europe that the drought in the beet fields would cause a shortage of a million tons of sugar. That shortage sent sugar beyond the price levels of the last 20 years. The crushing out of the beet industry of the West and the cane industry of Louisiana would make a shortage of nearly a million tons, and this shortage would be a more vital thing to the consumer than any slight increase because of a tariff.

Of course, it is possible to demonstrate on a narrow view of any given time that the taking off of 1⅛ cents of duty on a pound would make an immediate saving to the consumer.

It would be possible to demonstrate to the owner of any orchard in the Nation that he could cheapen the price of his apples for any given year by stopping his expenditure for the chemicals that fertilize the trees. He might do it for a series of years. But there is not an orchardist in the world who would not drive out the mathematician who should propose such a course of action, destructive of future supplies.

Our tariff on sugar preserves our domestic supply of sugar and nearly 1,000,000 tons from our beet fields and Louisiana is of vastly more benefit to the consumer than a theoretical saving by a free-trade arrangement.

OUR OWN SUPPLY A CAUSE OF LOW PRICES.

If gentlemen will examine for a moment this question of supply they can not fail to see where the true interests of the consumer lie. We use in the United States in a year three and one-third million tons of sugar. Our supply for this year comes chiefly from the following sources (Testimony, p. 3585), and is estimated:

	Tons.
American beet sugar	540,000
Louisiana cane sugar	300,000
Texas cane sugar	8,000
Porto Rico cane sugar	350,000
Hawaii cane sugar	500,000
Cuba cane sugar	1,800,000
Philippines cane sugar	200,000
Total	3,698,000

All this sugar is raised here or comes free into the United States except that from Cuba, which pays 1⅛ cents a pound duty where other outside countries pay 1⅞ cents.

Thus, with the encouragement which we have given to our domestic industry and to Cuba we will produce our supply within our own circle. We go abroad for very little sugar, so little that there is an internal competition which forces the Cuban planters to give to our consumers the tariff concession which they would be glad to keep for themselves.

We have taken Porto Rico and Hawaii into our national family. We have raised the standard of their labor and living, and they in turn have become great purchasers in our markets. Now, we are proposing to turn them over to the free competition of Java, where a man gets 25 cents a day and a woman 12 cents. If we paralyze those islands, take away from Cuba the preferential she now enjoys, at the same time extinguishing the Louisiana and domestic-beet industry, where are we to turn for sugar?

WHAT THE WORLD'S MARKET FOR SUGAR IS.

Why, we will turn to that great and indefinite refuge of antique economic theories, the world's market. On that we will depend.

What is that world's market? It is a great international combination of which we are not a part, and which is controlled by a committee in which we have no membership. When sugar soared skyward last September that committee might have remedied the price by letting more sugar into the world's market, but it did not do it then, although it has since taken action. As we within our own circle did not quite supply ourselves, we had to come nearly to their high prices. We were saved from going entirely to their prices by our beet production. (Testimony, p. 3581–3585.)

This branch of the subject is important enough for me to read to you from the testimony before our committee of the sugar expert who has been so often quoted in this debate, Mr. Willett, of New York. He said that to a great extent the sugar trade of the world is not free and open and clear, and is subject to bounties and restrictions and conditions. He gives this advice:

> I say increase the Cuban, Porto Rican, Hawaiian, Philippine, and domestic cane-sugar industry to a point above all requirements for consumption, up to 500,000 tons, so that if Cuba should give out some year and not produce much sugar we would still have enough for our consumption. Then we would be independent of the world and we would make our own price. That price will depend upon the competition between the different interests, between Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the domestic beet and cane industry. They will be all working to get our market and the consumer, then, will get the advantage.

THE MODERN SUPPLY AND ITS EFFECT ON PRICES.

What makes sugar so cheap in the world to-day is the great modern supply of sugar. In the earliest times sugar cane was the source of the world's sugar supply, and that cane supply was subject to all the conditions of the hectic, fitful civilizations of tropical and oriental islands. In Europe sugar was, until the beginning of the eighteenth century, a costly luxury and a medicine. In 1319 the Lord Chamberlain of Scotland paid about 40 cents a pound for sugar. In the middle of the eighteenth century Peter Faneuil, the great Boston merchant, was paying about the same price. If we had waited for those tropical islands to supply us with all of our sugar we would to-day be paying a price for sugar that would make the price paid by the Lord Chamberlain of Scotland six or eight centuries ago seem like a bargain-counter sacrifice. [Laughter.]

In 1840, near the middle of the nineteenth century, the world used but 1,150,000 tons of sugar, hardly more than a third of what the United States uses now in a year. It was nearly all cane sugar, but beet sugar was then just coming forward in Germany and France. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has argued to-day that because our domestic industry has been coming up so slowly, therefore, it is of no account, and should be disregarded. Is he aware how long it has taken to develop the beet-sugar industry, started in the time of Napoleon? Even before 1840 it was doing little or nothing in Germany. What developed it to its present position was not entirely its status as a sugar-producing process. It was the fact that the agriculturists of Germany, in their wise plan to make agriculture as profitable as possible, in order that they might stop the drift to the cities, hit upon the beet-sugar industry as one of the greatest features of their agricultural system; and I believe—and I think the facts will bear me out—that the progress that the United States has made in the production of beet sugar has not been so much due to the American demand for sugar here as to the fact that our Agricultural Department for a series of years conducted a campaign of education to introduce that industry, not for the sugar we would get, but for the advantage it would be to our agriculture. [Applause on Republican side.] Beet-sugar production is so used in every one of those countries on the Continent of Europe that are endeavoring to preserve the normal balance of their civilization. The great question to-day which is troubling European countries and which does not trouble us, because our rapid pioneer growth has obscured our vision as to what is going on, is the great drift of the people from the country to the cities. One of the most interesting studies in contemporaneous statesmanship to-day is the effort that the nations of Europe have made to stop that. As one instance, the little nation of Denmark, which has had the greatest success, has a law that any land once peasant land shall never be sold into large allotments. Denmark to-day has a less proportion of her people in the cities than any other nation. Interesting as that subject is, however, I shall not further digress.

In 1840 beet sugar was coming into use in France and Germany. In the 30 years following 1840 the world supply of sugar had trebled, and nearly half of this increased amount was beet sugar. To-day, after 40 years more, a little over half the world's supply is beet sugar. Its development has been most rapid. In 1900 the cane fields of the world were producing a little over three times as much sugar as they had been producing in 1840, or 60 years before; but the beet fields, with nearly 6,000,000 tons that year, were producing over a hundred times as much sugar as they produced in 1840. In the last 10 years the cane growers have awakened from their lethargy, and the production of both cane and beet sugar has marched ahead with surprising swiftness, until to-day it amounts for each kind to over 8,000,000 tons a year, giving the world a total production of almost 17,000,000 tons.

It is this great supply that makes sugar so cheap in these modern times. Without the beet sugar, which supplies the whole Continent of Europe and two-thirds of England's consumption, the price of cane sugar would rise to a point undreamed of by any person in this generation. In the United States the consumption of sugar doubles in 20 years, and yet, with this growing demand staring us in the face, this bill proposes to strike down our portion of the beet-sugar industry, and the report of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee tells us demurely that the business of cane refining is the first thing to be considered. In 1900 we produced 75,000 tons of beet sugar in the United States. This year we produced 540,000 tons.

SMALL INCREASE OF SUGAR PRICES.

What is the necessity of moving at once upon the sugar tariff as a means of reducing the cost of living, when there is so much to show us that we shall increase it, that the supply of sugar and not the tariff rate is what counts? I want to call your attention to a recent comparison made by a great financial journal of England as to the rise of prices in the eight years preceding 1910, a phenomenal and world-wide rise in prices, due in large measure probably to the increased production of gold under the stimulus of the new cyanide process, a process which last year resulted in trebling the amount of gold produced in a year if we compare last year with 20 years ago. That index of prices shows that in the last 8 years in this country sugar has risen only 8 per cent in price. Beef has risen 31 per cent in price; wheat, 38 per cent in price; potatoes, 38 per cent; butter, 41 per cent; pork, 74 per cent; corn, 77 per cent; and oats, 86 per cent. I will say that those rises in prices of commodities have gone on not only in this country, but in England and in her free-trade market. They have not oscillated so violently, because her standard is lower in prices for everything, but the same distinction between sugar and other commodities is shown in the markets of England. I want to call attention now to the fact that sugar, which has held its own level better than any other commodity, is, at the same time, the commodity which is produced and marketed under conditions that are further removed from the laissez faire, or free-trade policy, than the conditions surrounding the production of any other commodity of similar nature.

CHEAP SUGAR NOT A PRODUCT OF FREE TRADE.

No other commodity is so surrounded by tariffs and restrictions as is sugar. Even free-trade England puts a tariff duty on it. On the Continent of Europe sugar is watched over and guarded by all the devices criticized by the laissez faire school and condemned by the platforms and historic policy of the Democratic Party. And yet in the world-wide and troublesome rise of prices in the eight years preceding 1910 sugar in this market only went up 8 per cent, while other similar commodities went up from 31 to 74 per cent. There can be only one thing to account for it—that there is a better and more constant supply of sugar in the world than of the other commodities.

Now, I have assumed, as I have gone along, that this bill would destroy our cane and beet industry. I have told you that this bill avoids the countervailing clause of our tariff law. That would result——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HINDS. This bill will let in the bounty-fed sugar of Russia and Argentina. The sugar of Russia is not only bounty fed, but it is absolutely controlled by the autocratic Russian Government. They determine what sugar shall be produced, what prices it shall be sold for; they provide that a surplus shall be stored up; and they provide for the sending of that surplus to foreign markets. The Continent of Europe, free-trade England, Germany, and other countries, have not permitted more than 300,000 tons of Russian sugar to come upon their market. This year they have lengthened that out temporarily by 150,000 tons. This bill proposes to give to the Empire of Russia, if I construe its effects aright, a free and open market in the United States for all the sugar that may be produced by her partnership with the sugar factories and her control of the industry under her ancient despotism.

I believe that this, in conjunction with general free trade, would be sufficient in a few years to injure seriously the domestic sugar industry in the United States and seriously interfere with it in our colonial possessions. And I believe it because when bounty-fed sugar came into the general market of Europe it caused such destruction of the cane-sugar production of England's colonies that she—the one free-trade nation of Europe and not the protectionist nations—called a European council to stop the bounty-fed sugar from coming to their market. And yet what they can not stand we are proposing to turn against our growing and prosperous industry.

THE LABOR QUESTION.

Another reason why we should foster the beet-sugar industry is that it is a Temperate Zone industry with Temperate Zone labor. The industry of cane refining contemplates in one branch great tropical plantations tilled by many landless men working under tropical conditions for great proprietors, and in the other branch huge refineries on our seaboard largely controlled by a great trust. I have nothing against the cane refineries and would not injure them, but do insist that we should have a scientific inquiry by the Tariff Board before we do what they want. We should not so act as to benefit them at the expense of cutting out the domestic sugar production, of which the feature is less expensive, factories scattered in many places instead of in a few great cities, with the accompanying organization of many owners or tillers of small farms who work, live, and consume the products of other laborers after the manner of the Temperate Zone.

We should keep both branches of industry, but if we must choose between the plantations of Java and the farms of America, I would say, as the great poet of England said—

Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONNELL].

THE JOLLY TAXPAYER.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to introduce to the House an old and constant friend of mine, and indeed of all of us. Not only is he constant, but his patience is superb, until exhausted—whereupon he proceeded to do things which become especially and pointedly interesting to Congressmen and others in public life.

This jolly old friend of ours is ubiquitous in the political life of to-day in the United States, and, sir, when I heard a message read in this House yesterday from the President of the United States which convinced me that if the Chief Executive had ever met this particular old chap he failed to consult him on the subject of his message—the high cost of living, I was surprised, for the President could have learned much from him. But even the President shall not get by this friend of whom I speak, and whose familiar figure I could picture, had I the time, literally skipping up and down these aisles, kicking his heels in glee as he realized that something is to be done in the way of lifting from the shoulders of the millions burdens which they should never have been made to carry.

He may not be handsome, but the cares of life have multiplied for him so that there is reason for his homespun appearance. He may be less youthful than we should like to see him, but since he has grown old in carrying the weight and paying the expenses of a régime that coined his very blood and sweat that the coffers of the "malefactors of great wealth" might be filled to overflowing and that trusts might have the sinister power of corrupting government and fostering unrest by the gospel of greed, he may be pardoned his shoulder stoop and be tolerated even for the whisker which scoffing cartoonists so love to present with his pictures. This old friend of mine has kept enough of youth and agility to be jolly, and he always develops a special brand of jollity as he sets sail for public men who have deceived him and political parties that have robbed him in the name of prosperity. Behold him as he trudges over the hills to make himself felt in the election. See him as he makes his way to the grange meeting, or down the road to the village store, there to find out if possible why it always happened in late years that he received the smallest share of the value produced by his labor. See him gladly paying his share of the cost of great buildings in which his public servants may spend hours of comfort, while he saws wood, perhaps in some shed, through the cracks of which the snow scampers with chilling regularity. See him with his cattle, his horses, his harness, and his silo, never complaining of hard work, never stopping between sun and sun, and can you wonder that now that he has been awakened to the fact that he has been the victim for years of a system that promised him relief only to increase his burden, he is about to take a day off and do some political housecleaning, which for thoroughness and industry has never been equaled?

I said he was ubiquitous, this old friend of mine, because you meet him not only in the furrow and the meadow, but in the city street, the tenement block, and on the wharves by the seas and rivers. He spends his days in the sweatshop and his nights dreaming of better days to come. You find him in the factory, the ditch, the locomotive, and the airship. High up where men risk life, building for human comfort, and down where the miners toil and suffer and die, you will find him. Yes, you will meet this jolly friend taking from the clutch of the rocks the treasures which yield only to labor, and you will even find him in Congress in spirit, if not in person, especially through these days of promise and of dawning hope, and this is his day, for his name is "The Jolly Taxpayer."

And who has a better right to be here than he? Has he not made our country possible? Go back through the years and see him in the days of war, and behold how bravely he fought in the face of death, and where in history has the taxpayer of America been equaled in days of peace? That any party of political power should have been found in this land equal to deceiving this old friend of us all is more than passing strange. But, sir, he has discovered that he was being cheated. He saw his Representatives in Congress pass bills for his relief—the free list that would have lifted from his business the shackles of unnecessary taxation, the wool bill that would have made his clothing cheaper and maintained the Treasury at the same time, but he saw the bills vetoed in the interests of standpatters, which he has come to recognize as the epitome of all of his economic troubles. And now, sir, he stands at the door, he speaks on the corner, he is heard in the country, and his voice goes up from the metropolis, and everywhere he is saying, "Take every unnecessary burden from my table, make clothing cheaper, strike from my implements the taxes by which great trusts are strengthened, and woe betide the public man, the political party, that shall attempt to strangle democracy in the household of its friends, as was once done before."

Mr. Chairman, I have introduced my old friend in this debate because men in public life may as well begin now to get used to the old fellow, for hereafter he intends to be around when things are being done. It may be that he will ask strange questions, and at times he may say some tart things, but, after all that he has suffered and all that he has paid for the suffering, which has been his in so many varieties, he has a right to be on hand when Congress is debating. It may also happen that the jolly taxpayer may not see the fine threads in some of the closely woven arguments in which defenders of special privilege deal, but you may trust him to see the point of a situation which came out to-day in this debate when the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] essayed to enlighten the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as to where could be found in the journal of the Sugar Trust how on the same day a check was given to the Republican national committee and a check to the Democratic committee, the statement purporting to show with what exquisite impartiality the Sugar Trust worked the political game. Especially would the jolly taxpayer have caught the point when, just at that juncture, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] reminded the gentleman from Maine that it would also be found that the check given to the Democratic committee by the Sugar Trust was sent back, while the check given to the Republican committee by the Sugar Trust was spent to carry the election.

It is such things as this that have aroused the old man who pays the shot and that have started him on the warpath for a reduction in the cost of living. No use trying to sidetrack him from that issue. He took up that trail when he swept the Payne-Aldrich Congress into political oblivion, and he is fully bent upon completing the reform by placing in the White House a President who will know and honor the command of the overburdened American public when he hears it.

There was a time when tariff champions appealed to the masses of Americans in prophecies of calamity. They are still at it, not realizing that their occupation, like that of Othello, is gone. For instance, did anybody ever fancy such disaster as a result of the will of the people as has been predicted by standpatters in this Congress. I have often heard the prophets of disaster in various parts of the country, but I did not dream that Congress was the place where all the horrors of destruction were instituted and developed. If half of what we have heard in this House of late be half true, I conjure up now visions of bats simply hovering and dodging around the sugar-beet chimneys of Colorado, and the white frost of blight just waiting to fall upon and freeze the business of Louisiana, just as soon as the Democratic majority here shall have done that for which the American people sent it here—relieve the tables of the land from being victimized in taxation for the support of special interests.

Believe me, Mr. Chairman, the taxpayer of America becomes more jolly day by day instead of being frightened by this everlasting cry of blue ruin, which men who ought to be equal to statesmanship and to the common interests of over 90,000,000 people have been reveling in.

I am not unmindful of the fact that there are members of this majority who live in sections that have grown used to having Government, with its special power, aid their industries; nor is the taxpayer unmindful of such a situation. He remembers how the Wilson bill emerged from the House, made as the people intended it should be made, only to be protectionized and therefore robbed of its power to help the masses. Never again can that operation be repeated, for special privilege, long and terrible as has been its reign, shall not longer be permitted to stand in the way of that kind of progress which means cheaper living and genuine revision of the tariff downward.

Then, what an awakening has there been on the part of the taxpayers in the matter of business. Time was when the cry of the party in power was destruction of business in case the electorate should venture to make a change in government; and we have heard some dreadful roaring of business disaster in this House as a consequence of legislation in the interests of the people, some gentlemen facetiously calling them the "peepill," when we have dared to mention those by whose commands we are here.

Make no mistake, gentlemen; the taxpayer is no longer a joke. He is a live wire in human business and governmental capacity. He does not want to injure business, nor will he permit any party to do harm to any legitimate business in the land. He does mean that the instrumentalities of a free government shall not be used in the nefarious art of taxing the many for the enrichment of the few. He does mean that no business, no matter how able to swell campaign funds, shall use its millions in the debauchery of the electorate, and that so long as business shall keep its hand off government there will be no interference whatsoever with it, except it be to encourage it under the law and assure to it the fullest opportunities of the Republic. [Applause.]

As this is a bill to place sugar on the free list, I desire to incorporate in my remarks the closing argument of the Committee on Ways and Means on this bill:

TRUST SITUATION.

Probably no industry in this country has been more closely controlled by industrial combination than the manufacture and refining of sugar, and this condition exists to-day.

Much is said of "independent" sugar producers and of competition between refiners and cane producers, but little weight can be given to such statements. The House investigating committee, which made an elaborate inquiry into the competitive situation in sugar during the past year, gave special attention to the relations between beet and cane producers, and reached the conclusion (Report, p.16) that—

"To the 42.14 per cent of the production of sugar in the United States that the American Sugar Refining Co. admits is its own should be added, by any fair rule, 10 per cent, the National's production; 7 per cent, the production of the beet-sugar companies, in which the American is interested; and probably 3.25 per cent, the McCahan production. This makes a total of 20.25 per cent, which, added to the 42.14 per cent, makes a total of 62.39 per cent of the sugar manufacturing and refining industry of the United States which is either directly or indirectly controlled or influenced by the American, and we may add further that the evidence discloses that competitors not within the direct influence of the American are cautious about entering into active competition with it, and usually fix their prices in a comfortable vicinity to those of the American."

These findings fully explain how it was possible recently for sugar prices to the consumer to be so easily increased. In further discussing the trust feature the committee says:

"But the effect of combination among the refiners and manufacturers of raw sugar and the presence or absence of healthy competition is surely reflected in the variation of the margin between the prices of raw and refined sugar. During the nine years prior to the formation of the 'sugar refineries' combination the margin had averaged nearly $1.10 per 100 pounds, but in the four years preceding the formation of that organization severe competition among the refineries had reduced it to an average of 79.6 per 100. In 1885 it was 71.2 cents and in 1886 it was 78.1 cents per 100 pounds. (Testimony of Mr. Atkins, Hearings, p. 125.) In 1887, prior to the formation of the 'trust,' 76.8 cents; in 1888, when the Refiners' Trust had become well organized, it was $1.25; in 1889 it was $1.207. In 1890, because of the competition of Philadelphia independents (testimony of Atkins, Hearings, p. 126, and of Spreckels), it fell to 72 cents, rising to 82.8 cents in 1891 and to $1.035 in 1892, after the Philadelphia independents were purchased by the American. In 1893 it was $1.153; in 1894 it was 88 cents; 1895, 88.2 cents; in 1896, 90.8 cents; in 1897, 94.6 cents. The drop between 1893 and 1894 and the years immediately following can probably be accounted for because of the higher price of raw sugar during those years and the consequent greater value of the 5 per cent of waste in refining.

"In 1898 the refiner's margin fell rapidly to 73 cents and in 1899 to 50 cents, the effect of the sharp competition of Arbuckle. In 1900, when the Arbuckle 'war' was not quite so fierce, it rose to 75.4 cents. In 1901, when there was practical peace with Arbuckle, it rose to $1.003. It was 91.3 cents in 1902, 91.8 in 1903, 79.8 in 1904, the probable effect of beet-sugar production, relatively slight, being shown particularly in the last year. In 1905, by which time the American had acquired a large interest in beet sugar, it rose to 97.8 cents; in 1908, 88.4 cents; 1909, 75.8 cents; in 1910 it was 78.4 cents; and in 1911 it was 89.2 cents. It is worthy of note in connection with the figures for the years 1904 to 1909, inclusive, during which the refiner's margin ranged lower, with the exception of the year 1905, than the years immediately preceding them, that the American was subjected to the active and progressive competition of independents.

"It is especially worthy of note that in 1889, when the refiner's margin was $1.25, the Sugar Refineries Co. had a practical monopoly, controlling 75 per cent of the production. By 1903 it will be remembered that the American had secured control of nearly 90 per cent of the industry, and during that year the refiner's difference was the highest in the history of the industry since 1889, being $1.153.

"The climax of the Arbuckle competition is reflected in the margin of 50 cents for the year 1899, the lowest in the history of the industry.

"The influence, both of the beet-sugar companies and of the Federal and of Warner's, is reflected in the somewhat lower margins prevailing since 1904, and including that year.

"That the price of refined sugar had been kept up in order to pay dividends on bounteously watered stocks is also evident when we come to consider overcapitalization. * * *

"That the overcapitalization of these corporations and the payment of dividends on watered stocks, so that the same might acquire a market value, has necessitated excessive profits on the real capital invested, and has consequently occasioned higher prices for the product and heavier taxation of the consumer, can hardly be questioned by anyone who conscientiously investigates conditions in this great industry. To what exact extent this has increased the price of refined sugar to the consumer it is absolutely impossible to accurately estimate or exactly state, but that the increase for that reason is considerable can not be disputed.

"The contention of the American Sugar Refining Co. that because sugar costs the consumer less to-day than it did when that corporation was organized, therefore the existence and operation of the corporation has benefited rather than injured the consumer we regard as unsound. Such a contention entirely ignores most important considerations, such as improvement in the processes and reduction in the cost of refining and manufacturing during that period of time; the greater supply of raw material; improved methods of cultivating sugar cane and sugar beets; and a perfect host of conditions that are entirely independent of the existence of the American or any other sugar refining or manufacturing company.

"Besides, in the last 20 years the reduction in price has been world-wide, embracing in its scope all the countries of the earth, from the most enlightened to the most barbarous, and surely no American corporation can claim that it accomplished this result in countries where it has no business and where its very name is practically unknown. In the opinion of your committee, the reduction in the price of sugar in the last 20 years to the American consumer did not come because of the organization and operation of the American Sugar Refining Co."

Simultaneously with the increase in price of sugar to the consumer there has been a decided decrease in the price paid to the producer for the raw material. Louisiana cane growers have never received fair treatment from the sugar manufacturers. The well-organized condition of the industry, its rapid development, admitted profits, an environment permitting the increase of prices to the consumer and the payment of less to the producer for the raw material, are valid and effective reasons for the removal of the tariff protection, which aids in maintaining this undesirable condition.

REVENUE LOSS PROVIDED FOR.

The chief argument which has heretofore been made for the retention of the tariff on sugar is its importance as a revenue producer. The committee has given a great deal of time and consideration to this special feature of the sugar schedule. Their labor and effort has been to accede to the very general and persistent public demand for free sugar. The committee earnestly desires to assist the people in acquiring this important food product at reduced prices and so lighten the burdens of the present high cost of living. However, the committee has not been willing to recommend that sugar be exempted from import duty without suggesting another source of revenue which would make good the loss to the Treasury from the sugar schedule and at the same time more equitably distribute the tax burden without inflicting hardship at any point. After a very thorough investigation of the entire field of revenue possibilities the most practicable and just solution of the problem appeared to be to extend the operations of the corporation-tax law of 1909, and this the committee is doing by reporting simultaneously H. R. 21213, placing sugar on the free list, and H. R. 21214, extending the excise law to individuals and copartnerships. The law as applied to corporations brought to the Treasury $33,511,525 in 1911, and by extending this measure to business conducted by individuals and copartnerships it is believed that the loss in revenue of the sugar schedule will be fully cared for. The very desirable end sought by this legislation is to remove the duty from an article necessary to the existence of every individual and in lieu of the revenue source thus surrendered to levy a very small tax against the business of individuals and copartnerships where the income of the year exceeds $5,000. The recommendation is that the tax on a food product necessary to existence be shifted from those who now struggle with tax burdens on the necessaries of life to the shoulders of those who through good fortune and comfortable means are amply able to assume a relatively insignificant tax. To illustrate the equitable adjustment of the excise tax recommended, a person having an income of less than $5,000 per year would pay nothing, while a person whose business brings $10,000 net would pay no tax on the first $5,000 and on the second $5,000 would pay only $50 a year.

THE TARIFF AND THE CONSUMER.

It was clearly brought out by the special committee investigating the American Sugar Refining Co. and others that the full amount of the import tax on sugar is borne by the consumer. Mr. Claus Spreckels (Hearings, p. 2245) testified that the price of refined sugar to the American consumer is affected to the full extent of the duty. Further, in reply to the inquiry as to whether the exempting of sugar from duty would reduce the price by the amount of the duty, Mr. Spreckels replied, "By the amount of the duty."

Further confirmation of the fact that the full amount of the tariff tax on sugar is transferred to the consumer in the form of increased prices is found in the evidence of Mr. Wallace P. Willett, a recognized sugar statistical expert, before the special committee referred to, who says (Hearings, p. 3547): "Whenever duty is taken off the consumer gets the full benefit of the amount of duty taken off and also a part of the lower cost of refining."

The tariff tax amounts to about 1½ cents per pound on sugar. As this entire tax enters into the price of sugar to the consumer it is easy to estimate the consumer's burden because of tariff duties on sugar. The consumption of sugar in continental United States amounted in 1911 to about 7,663,000,000 pounds, and the application of 1½ cents per pound to this consumption affords an estimated saving to the American consumers from placing sugar on the free list of not less than $115,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, the committee of wholesale grocers, formed to assist in obtaining cheaper sugar for consumers through reduction of duties on raw and refined sugars, of New York City, sends me the following, which I desire to incorporate in my remarks. The subject is the sugar tariff and the Sugar Trust:

The "free-sugar" bill, introduced into the House of Representatives by OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, brought forth the usual wail from the domestic sugar interests, who claim that "ruination" stares them in the face if this bill becomes a law. For the present tariff on sugar to be reduced 1 mill would bring forth the same outcry.

Hoping to confuse the issue, they endeavor to make the people believe that the Sugar Trust wants the rate of duty reduced so as to crush out their competitors, the beet-sugar producers. The sugar trade knows how ridiculous is this contention. The Sugar Trust is distinctly on record to the contrary. Reference to the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Hearings of 1909 discloses a letter and a brief (pp. 3430–3440) filed by the American Sugar Refining Co. urging that the present tariff rate be maintained. To insure this, they have worked mainly through their beet-sugar allies. The trust's interest in the matter is clear. The Hardwick investigating committee developed the Sugar Trust's control of the beet-sugar industry. (Hardwick Hearings, pp. 58, 100, 2884, and 2992.) This industry secures a heavy indirect bounty through our present high tariff on sugar, and the trust becoming fond of this Government "pap," which is being fed to its offspring, naturally desires it to be continued.

The beet-sugar lobbyist makes much of the fact that Mr. Atkins, vice president of the American Sugar Refining Co., when on the stand before the Hardwick investigating committee, stated that he was in favor of lower duties on sugar. He also distinctly stated that he spoke as an individual. Mr. Atkins, before he became connected with the American Sugar Refining Co., after the death of Mr. H. O. Havemeyer, had for years been working for lower duties on sugar, and he could not very well reverse himself after he became connected with the trust.

The few independent cane-sugar refiners have declared themselves in favor of lower duties. Their interest is identical with that of the consumer. A lower tariff rate would reduce the price of sugar, resulting in an increased consumption, so that a larger business could be done at a reduced expense. In addition, they would no doubt be very glad to have the Government discontinue subsidizing their competitor, the Sugar Trust, through the high protection now given to the trust's beet-sugar factories. The line is clearly established, with consumers.

manufacturers, dealers, and independent refiners desiring lower duties, and opposed to this the Sugar Trust and their allies, the domestic sugar producers.

The domestic beet-sugar men make the claim that they were responsible for the decline from the high price touched last September. Instead, they simply followed the market. (Hardwick Hearings, p. 3372.) Quotations for beet sugar f. o. b. Hamburg touched 18s. 9d. in September, declining to 16s. by December 4, a reaction of 66 cents a hundred pounds. American beet-sugar factories sold their product in September at 6.50 cents, and by December 4 had declined to 5.90 cents, a reaction of 60 cents a hundred. Our 500,000 tons of domestic beet sugar which began to come on the market in July in California and before the sharp advance was not responsible for the decline, which came after the 1st of October. This six and a half million tons produced in Europe, coming on the market around the 1st of October, was responsible for the reaction.

As an indication of what the American consumer may expect from the domestic beet-sugar industry, let us refer to a recent occurrence. About the middle of February, in anticipation of higher prices, the beet-sugar factories with one accord withdrew their product from the market, although 25 per cent of their production remained unsold. Willett & Gray's Statistical Sugar Trade Journal of February 29 covers the situation. They say:

"The beet-sugar factories are still quoting 5.90 cents less 2 per cent, and thus practically withdrawn from the general market."

New York cane-sugar refiners were then, and are still, selling granulated at 5.80 cents. The beet-sugar factories suddenly withdrew their product, in an endeavor to force higher prices, in face of the fact that sugar was then a half a cent higher than the lowest price touched since the 1st of January, 1912, and fully 2⅛ cents a pound above the cost of producing beet sugar. As a result of the figures furnished by the beet-sugar men the Hardwick committee showed that beet sugar could be produced at less than 3 cents a pound, and taking competent and incompetent factories, properly and improperly located, the average cost was only 3⅛ cents a pound. On the latter basis, which is known to be high, prices quoted above show a profit of 70 per cent over the cost of production. It is possible, therefore, that the dividends of 33⅓ per cent paid by the Michigan Beet Sugar Co., and 100 per cent paid by the Union Sugar Co., of California, last year will be bettered this year. Yet these are the people who cry "ruination" if the present tariff is reduced. Any attempt to show that these gentlemen are in business for the purpose of philanthropy only proves that the one making the claim is either not familiar with the situation or is willfully attempting to mislead.

Testimony taken by the Ways and Means Committee and the Hardwick investigating committee shows that the tariff increases the price of sugar to consumers nearly 2 cents a pound, and it is estimated that this tax amounts to $104,000,000 annually. Some estimates run as high as $140,000,000, but all are agreed on the former as a minimum. Of this the Government collects $52,000,000 from import duties, or 17 per cent of the entire customs revenue, but only 50 per cent of the sugar which we consume shares in producing this revenue, as the imports from our insular possessions—Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines—being inside of our tariff wall, pay no duty and share in dividing the profits from our tariff, or the remaining $52,000,000 or more, with the producers of cane and beet sugar in the States.

Our Government has once made the mistake of attempting to foster the production of sugar under abnormal conditions in Louisiana. We can not afford to repeat this mistake in a larger way with beet sugar. The production of cane sugar (a tropical plant) in Louisiana can never be a success, yet the American people have been required to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on the industry, now 100 years old, and this "infant" is crying just as loudly as ever for tariff favors. Under the "hothousing" process the maximum production has been reached, with only 8⅛ per cent of our requirements being filled, so that the American people can never hope to secure any permanent benefit from the production of cane sugar in Louisiana, which is dependent on "special-privilege legislation." The farseeing men in Louisiana admit that it would have been a great blessing to their State if the tariff on sugar had been removed 25 years ago, as in that event their lands would now be producing more suitable and remunerative crops. The Hardwick committee report (p. 26) shows that the present tariff is so high that it encourages overcapitalization of beet-sugar plants. It also encourages the improper location of factories where natural conditions are not such as to produce the best results. The industry would be on a much better footing if the tariff were revised, so as to prevent both of these conditions, which are fundamentally so unsound.

Mr. William Bayard Cutting, one of the first in this country to engage in the production of beet sugar, stated "that the beet-sugar industry is profitable under conditions of absolutely free trade, and that the United States being an agricultural country, the industry has nothing to fear even from the annexation of Cuba." Prof. F. W. Taussig, Henry Lee professor of economics at Harvard University, in the February issue of the Quarterly Journal of Economics, says regarding the beet-sugar industry: "If protection to young industries was needed, it has been given. The initial stages of trial and unfamiliarity are certainly passed. The industry in the far West has certainly passed the infant stage. Its difficulties in the farming region proper seem to be due to the competition of the other kinds of agriculture, which, under the typical American conditions, are more profitable. If this kind of agriculture needs protection and if the familiar grain growing, cattle fattening, and dairying of the corn-wheat belt do not, the explanation is still to be found in the principle of comparative cost." Therefore, if the tariff is materially reduced or removed, only the unnatural development of the industry is stopped, while its natural growth is unhampered, and the result will be of material benefit to all of our people.

Let those who claim that the public will not receive the benefit of a reduced tariff refer to the year 1891, when the tariff law reducing the duty 2 cents a pound became effective April 1. Refiners' quotations fell 1⅜ cents in one week—from 6⅛ cents, the quotation of March 26, to 4¾ cents, the quotation of April 2. By May 14 granulated sugar had reached 4⅛ cents. Let them also refer to the testimony taken by the Hardwick investigating committee (pp. 35–47). Absolutely free trade on sugar would mean foreign competition for our refiners, making it impossible for them to advance prices beyond world's values.

The country has been taxed heavily for many years for the benefit of the domestic sugar industry, and the time has come when the public's interests rather than the profits of promoters should be considered.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, why should the gentleman not make his remarks on the floor on this very important bill? I would like to hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object until I ascertain the information. What is the intention in reference to further debate?

Mr. RAINEY. I have an hour, and I have a number of gentlemen on my list who want to speak from 5 to 25 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to consent to the gentleman yielding out his hour one minute at a time and have each gentleman get leave to extend his remarks until I know what the general debate really is to be.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know but one other gentleman during the hour who desires to extend his remarks in the RECORD. The others to whom I shall yield expect to speak, and I presume, then, they expect to take some time to extend also.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object at present, in the absence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I give notice that I am not going to permit, by unanimous consent, everybody in the House to extend remarks in the RECORD when we do not know how long the debate is going to run.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman desires to know the subject on which I propose to extend my remarks, I will say that it is on the subject of the bill under consideration.

Mr. MANN. That was not the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] extending his remarks in the RECORD? Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I shall object unless we can ascertain as to whether or not we are to have debate cut off. I wish to hear what the gentlemen have to say on this subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that there have been requests coming to me from his side of the House for general leave to print on this bill, and I intended when we got back into the House—inasmuch as we can not ask for it in the committee—to ask for a general leave for everyone who has spoken on the bill to extend his remarks, and for those who have not spoken leave to print for five legislative days, if it meets with the approval of the Members of the House.

Mr. MANN. I have listened to every speech that has been made on the floor of this House to-day, and I hope I will listen to others. I am still lacking a great deal of information on this subject. I think it is important enough that the House should hear the gentlemen who have information on it, and not merely let them insert speeches in the RECORD that I certainly will not have the opportunity to read, and I presume other Members will not read, in the busy session of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] to extending his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, for the present I shall object.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I rise, not so much to make remarks upon the sugar tariff, as to read to our stand-pat friends across the aisle a few of the many letters that have lately been coming from the Republicans of my district. As I have sat here through the discussions upon three tariff bills this session and watched these gentlemen voting stolidly against every proposal to lighten the burden of taxation from which the people are suffering, I have wondered whether they ever consult the voters and taxpayers in their districts, and if they do, whether they really believe in representative government.

My notion of the duty of a Representative, Mr. Speaker, is very simple. It is that upon the great questions of the day he shall learn what his constituents desire him to do, and that then he shall do it.

About three weeks ago I began to send to the voters of my district many thousands of letters asking them to give me their views upon a dozen of the leading subjects which come before us at this session, and, if they desired to do so, their presidential preferences. These letters are going out to all the voters, irrespective of party, and the answers are coming in freely, now somewhat less than 100 a day.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AYRES. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is proposing to discuss the duties of Members of Congress. Does he believe that in the face of the fact that it has been announced here, or given generally to be understood, that debate on a bill effecting $53,000,000 of revenue is to be cut off, and Members of this House are to be denied free expression of their opinions with reference to that bill—does he believe that he is acting the part of the high standard of a Member of Congress by taking up the time in delivering a lecture in the midst of this discussion, the lecture not having any connection whatever with the bill under discussion?

Mr. AYRES. I think the gentleman, before I finish, will consider that I have discussed the tariff question. The results have been tabulated up to last Saturday, March 9, when 1,783 replies had been received, and while that number can not be considered a complete referendum of the district, the decisions are so plain that he who runs may read. When, on election night, upon the illuminated board in front of some great newspaper is flashed the bulletin: "One hundred and seventy-five election districts out of 850 in Brooklyn give John Smith 4,891 plurality over Thomas Brown," everybody knows that John Smith is elected, and that the complete returns will only make his majority the greater.

The district which I have the honor to represent is the Bronx, the northern part of New York City, a great manufacturing center, and separated from Manhattan by the Harlem River. Our citizens mostly live in detached houses, with yards and gardens, although we also have many flats and apartments. The northeasterly corner of my district is just 11 miles from the westerly line of the district represented by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. In many respects these two districts are alike. Each has a frontage on Long Island Sound, and is interested in marine affairs, each contains numerous and diversified manufacturing industries, in each the growth of population is largely caused by the overflow from Manhattan, and in each the sentiments of the people upon the tariff are much the same.

One of the first letters that came was the following:

We should have all our Congressmen real representatives of the people; but as it is now our so-called Representatives are, in a great many instances, the clerks of the big business interests. Hoping that this idea will give you something to think about, I am,

Yours, very truly, DAVID ROUSSEAU.

Mr. DALZELL. That is an insult to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES] has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. AYRES. It did give me something to think about, something that I have thought about many times before. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me especially disclaim making a charge against any one of my stand-pat friends across the aisle that he is a "clerk of the big business interests" in what might be deemed a personal or unpleasant way. But the fact remains that each one of these gentlemen who resist so stoutly the lowering of the outrageous tariffs is a representative of certain big manufacturing interests and of them alone; for these big manufacturing interests and the gentlemen across the aisle are practically the only American citizens remaining who believe in maintaining the present tariffs. It is certain that the great bulk of honest, thinking Republicans do not believe in the tariffs of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

And may I offer to my stand-pat friends a bit of advice—my stand-pat friends who think they are leading the Republican Party. It is, indeed, a noble and inspiring thing to lead a united and harmonious army against the enemy, but it is dangerous to the leaders when the army decides not to follow. It is glorious to be in the van carrying the colors, but it is sad, indeed, to have your own army shoot you in the back. And it would be much safer for my friends on the other side of this Chamber if they would take the advice offered by another Republican of my district, who writes this:

I appreciate your courtesy in asking my views on the questions submitted. I will only suggest that I think Republicans and Democrats, in a spirit of lofty patriotism and statesmanship, should compromise on moderate tariff bills.

Very sincerely, D. C. MCKAY.

The tariff bills that have been offered by our Ways and Means Committee—the wool bill, the steel bill, the chemical schedule—are moderate bills. They are reasonable and gradual reductions of the tariff. And a certain section of the Republicans in this Chamber, realizing that fact, have cooperated with us in giving their support to each of these measures. We welcome the help of these Progressives. We believe them, in respect to the tariff, actuated by an earnest desire to meet the wishes of their constituents. And in voting for lower duties they are displaying courage, honor, and statesmanship.

We believe that these Progressives represent the real sentiment of the bulk of the Republican Party on the tariff question, and it is to show them that in the East, also, the voters in their party are for lower duties that I wish to read some letters from the plain Republicans, not the politicians, of my district.

Mr. Chairman, the first two questions on the list asked the voters were about the tariff. Did they think it should be lowered? Up to last Saturday 636 Republicans have written their views on this subject, and of this number 533 said they believed the Payne-Aldrich tariff is too high and only 103 wanted it left alone. The Democrats and Independents who sent letters were almost unanimous in desiring the duties cut, so that of the 1,680 letters on this point received in the past two weeks 1,504 were for lower duties and only 176 for the present rates. Here are a few of these Republican letters, so that you standpatters across the aisle may know what your party really wants:

J. P. CHAMBERLAIN & Co.,
Manufacturers' Agents for Foreign and Domestic Woolens.

The reduction of the woolen tariff most interests me. The ad valorem principle of the last Democratic tariff bill is right, and 50 per cent ad valorem, with no specific duty, is conservative. * * * Pass such a bill, and we will have a settled condition of business in textiles such as we have not had since 1907.

J. P. CHAMBERLAIN,

I am decidedly of the opinion that the present wool schedule is shamefully high and should be lowered. I feel equally strong that judgment should be used in its correction. * * * I mean that it should be done by degrees. I am a dyed-in-the-wool Republican, but I am not in sympathy with their practices as applied to tariff legislation and feel there are many more in the party who agree with me.

HARRY W. KING.

Tariff and protection (God save the mark) are widely different things, the former being all right if properly levied, but the latter covers a multitude of sins, because it works to the advantage of the few who do not need it as against the many who do need it. Tariff for revenue only, and levy it on the luxuries of life.

JNO. HENRY FISHER.

I do not think that the tariff on wool, steel, and cotton should be reduced to such an extent as to destroy a legitimate profit on domestic production; but I believe there is now a sufficient margin to permit a lowering of the tariff without injury to our interests. Of the Republican candidates in the field I do not think I shall vote for either if nominated.

A. ANSWATER.

With regard to the tariff question, I believe that the present duty is too high, and while I favor a protective tariff I believe that it should be based upon domestic and foreign costs, so as to place our manufacturers merely upon an equality.

JOHN EWEN,
Spuyten Duyvil.

I would suggest that the reduction on general lines take place at the earliest possible time. Reduction to be on all the absolute necessities, such as food and wearing apparel. Not for the benefit of the wealthy, but of benefit to the medium and poorer classes.

JOHN S. LINN,
2712 Heath Avenue.

I am led to favor a gradual reduction in the tariff, not from any conviction that there is merit in a low duty, but simply as an experiment. Although I have grave doubts concerning the method, it may nevertheless prove advantageous despite my opinion to the contrary, and I am willing to have a trial made.

CHARLES E. W. HELLERSON,
406 West 261st Street.

Labor is not benefited by protection. It simply helps to rob the people. All duties should be for revenue only. Free materials and free ships will put us way ahead of both England and Germany.

I am pleased to answer your inquiries and to express to you the thoughts of the citizen and the taxpayer. I would state that I have always been an independent Republican. It is self-evident to all thinking men that party lines are pretty nearly wiped out. We have been done up brown by both parties, and it is time we forgot them. What we need is just such work as your letter indicates—a closer understanding between the Representatives and the people.

FELIX HOFFMAN.

I would like to see some Democrat as President, for I believe some tariff revision is necessary.

LOUIS GREY,
441 East One hundred and fortieth Street.

I also believe that your idea of getting the opinion of the voters of your district is the proper one, and while I am a Republican all my life I am opposed to the present protective tariff and believe it should be revised. Will be very happy to promise you my vote if you support tariff revision, regardless of your position on other questions.

A. E. FULLER.

I do believe that some changes in our tariff are needed, and where certain things now protected can compete in the foreign markets, it is about time we in America got the benefit.

BEVERLY A. SMITH,
53 Marble Hill Avenue.

MARCH 4, 1912.

With regard to the tariff, I believe this question should be taken out of politics entirely and handled by a commission and scientifically revised. It is my opinion there should not be a wholesale reduction, but as the tariff now stands it prohibits competition between this and foreign countries to a great extent, and by protecting the trusts keeps the cost of necessary commodities almost beyond the reach of people with modest incomes.

L. J. CHILDS.

While I have always voted the Republican national ticket because I believed in the principle of a high tariff, my belief to-day is that after sufficient revenue is provided for Government maintenance, that the tariff be entirely abolished.

MORRIS ROSENBAUM.

I have always voted the Republican ticket, but have turned independent, as I do not believe we need any high tariff any more.

ISIDOR LASH.

I am in favor of a revision of the tariff. I think all duties should be removed except as needed for revenue and to protect new industries which are worth while protecting.

F. H. WEEKES.

In regard to tariff revision, I am holding the same opinion as nearly all business men I am coming in contact with, viz, reduce it to a revenue basis and have it over with as soon as possible, in order that we may know where we stand. The uncertainty is killing.

CHRISTIAN H. WERNER, 2979 Marion Avenue.

When a child is toddling we help it along with apron strings, etc. When it is full grown it is able and aggressive enough to fight its own way. * * * Now, while some tariff is needed, the apron-string period is long since past. However, I do not believe in free trade, but a reduction in existing high tariff.

GEORGE E. CUTTLE.

I consider that it is the bounden duty of Mr. OSCAR UNDERWOOD and his colleagues to report a bill immediately that will afford immediate and substantial relief to business people from the payment of unjust, exorbitant, and prohibitive duties on the first necessary of life after foodstuffs. We devour food to keep the inner man warm. Congress has denied and is denying the right of every human being to possess clothing that will keep them warm without having to pay tribute to manufacturing interests.

HALLECK D. VAN PELT,
Corner Fieldston Avenue and Two Hundred and Sixty-first Street.

I have your polite note to a Republican, which I appreciate very much. I think this tariff needs pruning on many sides. * * * We should now be beyond the phase of revolutionary legislation on the tariff, but at the same time the old method of swapping tariff favors violates the rules of common decency.

E. K. MARTIN.

You ask why I think the tariff should be reduced. For years I have read * * * that American goods manufactured here could be bought cheaper in Europe than here. Two articles probably mentioned the most are watches and harvesting machinery. I am a firm believer in the protection of new industries until firmly established, and then a reduction by commission, if possible.

WILLIAM HODGSON,
153 East One Hundred and Seventy-ninth Street.

I would say, in brief, that in my opinion, and also in that of some others I know, the present tariff is unfair to the people, who are compelled to pay more for inferior articles. This is especially true of clothes. By the present tariff it is the manufacturer who receives the benefit; not the people. Wages have been going down in many trades instead of up. It is getting harder for native Americans to get a job every year. * * * Take the apartments I have been living in for the past six years. I have never yet seen a native American do any painting in them. It has all been done by foreigners who can hardly speak English. The strike at Lawrence is a good example of what manufacturers consider "living wages." * * * We need some kind of change, and I firmly believe taking off the tariff would help the masses.

CHARLES J. LEACH.

The reason I have for desiring a reduction in tariff is that this will tend to reduce living expenses by bringing competition and thus stopping the trusts from creating artificial prices. I can assure you as a wage earner that it is difficult to-day to make both ends meet.

E. M. MAHER.

As to giving you my reasons for believing that the tariff should be lowered, there are so many details that I should like to refer to and so many abuses that I have seen that I could hardly state my reasons in 10 lines as you suggest. I might state generally, however, that my particular grievance against the present tariff, while of course due fundamentally to the enormous rates on some of the articles, is more particularly on account of the outrageous subterfuges employed to hide these rates.

BENJAMIN A. LEVITT.

Here is a letter from the president of one of the largest manufacturing institutions in the Bronx, the Morris Heights Gas Engine & Power Co., which makes steam and gasoline power boats. It perhaps turns out each year more gasoline launches than any other concern in the United States. Its president, Mr. John J. Amory, is a lifelong Republican and a most intelligent and useful citizen. After stating that he believes the tariffs should be lowered, he says:

Most reluctantly I confess, man to man, a lamentable ignorance on the subject in question. I have heard the matter discussed pro and con to such an extent that my brain whirls, dizzy with doubt. Broadly speaking, I am of the opinion that high tariff or low tariff, or no tariff, should be fixed as the result of careful and unprejudiced investigation, by a competent committee appointed for that subject as to each of the different commodities.

It appears to me that the recent investigation of Schedule K, the wool tariff, proved conclusively the desirability of treating the whole tariff proposition along like lines.

JOHN J. AMORY.

One of the industries which have grown up in our district is the making of pianos. More musical instruments are made in the Bronx than in any other similar area in the United States. We now have 51 piano factories, among them the makers of many instruments which bear well-known names. Experts say that the air of the Bronx gives a superior tone. This may well be so, because the east wind, careering in from the ocean across the plains of Long Island, hovers above that little suburb just across the upper East River called Oyster Bay, and thus comes into our borough freighted with sound. The tariff affects all of these manufacturers, and here are letters from two of them:

THE BOGART PIANO CO.

We are pleased to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 15th with copy of House bill 18642 (the steel bill), and we have failed to find therein anything that would be a detriment to our business in any way, shape, or form. * * * Answering your question as to whether we believe the schedules of the Payne-Aldrich law are too high and could be safely reduced without interfering with our business, we believe that they could.

E. B. BOGART, President.

LUDWIG & CO., GRAND AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

I am in receipt of your letter, with inclosure of House bill No. 20182 (chemical schedule), and after * * * seeing the very small duty to be put on Chinese nut oil, I can not feel that this is an exorbitant duty, and do not doubt but what it would be perfectly right. * * * Have also looked over bill No. 18642 (metal schedule), * * * and must say that I would not consider that our business would suffer any. * * *

L. D. PERRY, Treasurer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there were time I could read hundreds of these letters, but the fact I wish to emphasize is that five out of six of the Republicans are in favor of lower tariffs. Why, then, will not you gentlemen who assume to represent them vote as they want you to do?

The next question asked of the voters was their opinion as to the parcel post. The committee of the House which has charge of postal matters has just brought in the annual appropriation bill and incorporated in it a provision for a rural parcel post and a reduction of fourth-class rates on packages of 1 pound and upward. This is a most conservative provision, and, in my judgment, does not meet the demand of the people for a real parcel post. I sincerely hope section 8 will be amended and made more liberal before it is enacted into law. The wish of the people of our district was indicated unmistakably by their letters. The vote is 1,678 for and but 69 against it. Such unanimity shows that it is favored by voters of all parties. More than this, no question asked was so enthusiastically answered in the affirmative. The people want the parcel post.

The question as to the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, especially of the recall of judges, brought forth many interesting letters. The votes cast to the date mentioned are as follows:

	For.	Against.	Not voting.
Initiative	878	449	456
Referendum	955	426	402
Recall	831	609	343
Recall of judges	763	688	332

It is evident that many do not understand what is meant by these propositions. In fact, many frankly confessed that they did not know and some said they did not want to know, believing that the old style of representative government was good enough for them. Some of the comments made are full of valuable suggestion and furnish food for thought. Here are a few of them:

I have answered some of the questions, * * * but I think many such questions can not be answered by the constituent, and the fact that they can not is, to my mind, the one convincing argument for representative government—the government established by the Constitution. We send a Representative to Congress, who sits in committee, which either knows about the subject or has power or means for obtaining the knowledge. I take the liberty of saying these things only to explain why I am against the "initiative, the referendum, and the recall." Those things may belong to some other form of government. They may be possible in some small Commonwealth like ancient Athens or modern Switzerland, but they are foreign to our constitutional form of representative government and would be destructive of it if attempted. * * * Although I am a protectionist, it is impossible for me to say whether the tariff rates are too high. I have a suspicion, however, that they are in instances and I believe this impression is general throughout the country.

LOUIS O. VAN DOREN.

DEAR MR. AYRES: I will support no candidate for President who favors and advocates the revolutionary doctrine of the "initiative, referendum, and recall." That scheme would produce turmoil, strife, violence, anarchy, and mob rule all over our country. It is a dangerous, wicked doctrine.

HENRY L. SMITH.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.

MY DEAR MR. AYRES: As my Representative, I expect you to exercise your judgment and a knowledge which in the nature of things must be better than I can have, on all questions which affect the country as a whole. Your duty to your district is only a fractional part of your whole duty.

D. P. KINGSLEY.

The votes on the other questions of current interest were as follows:

Shall civil-service employees be retired upon pensions after faithful service?

In favor	1,211
Opposed	432

Shall the United States retain the title to the Alaska coal deposits and own and operate the railroads to tide water?

In favor	1,325

Shall the Army be increased and kept in a state of efficiency?

Shall the Navy be increased—two battleships a year?

In favor	1,194

The Sherwood (dollar-a-day) pension bill:

Election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people:

In favor	1,556

It was suggested that such as desired might express their preferences of presidential candidates. Many did not wish to do so. But of the Republicans who voted this is the summary:

William H. Taft	338
Theodore Roosevelt	209
Charles E. Hughes	27
ROBERT LA FOLLETTE	17
Scattering	90

A review of the letters from Democrats shows a large number who express a preference either for CHAMP CLARK or for OSCAR UNDERWOOD. Scarcely a letter arrived that did not contain the name of one or the other of these distinguished gentlemen as either first or second choice. And this is convincing proof that the work of this Democratic House in its efforts to reduce the tariff has met the enthusiastic approval of the Democrats of the Nation.

Many of the comments made by voters as to presidential candidates are unique and ingenious. Here are a few of them, given without the names of the authors, but with the party to which they belong:

Harmon and harmony; that's my ticket. (A Democrat.)

I believe Taft's work embodies democratic principles. (A Republican.)

My first choice is Roosevelt; second choice LA FOLLETTE, because of "past performances." I think he would make an able and efficient Executive; third choice Wilson. * * * Eliminating Roosevelt and LA FOLLETTE from the Republican side, I would cast my vote for him, and know at least 25 Republicans among my friends who would also vote for him. * * * (A Republican.)

Will work for Gov. Wilson;
Will vote for CLARK or Harmon;
Will stay home for Taft;
And go fishing for T. R.

(An Independent.)

Here's to CHAMP CLARK;
Hear the hounds bark;
The people are coming to town.
Hark! Hark! Hark!
What a fine lark;
They dassen't kick us aroun'.

(A Democrat.)

UNDERWOOD and SULZER. Well, nobody objects to SULZER, and his bullhead luck can't be beat. If he picked up a piece of coal in the Pennsylvania Station, it would turn into a diamond by the time he got to Washington. (A Democrat.)

I think your idea of sending out these letters a very good one, worthy of a Socialist. While I am not in favor of an increase of the Army, I do not believe in a decrease in any part of the service. (A Socialist.)

At first I wrote Roosevelt as my first choice, but as I have always been conservative, though I have only voted six times, I feel he is too uncertain. There is no need of remaking the Constitution, nor of exploiting the people by inciting their hatred of those in better circumstances. * * * Let us run along on the old lines, with just a little more individual honesty. (A Republican, written the day after the Columbus speech.)

And here are two more letters that have come, each one showing that the author has definite views as to wise governmental policies:

I would like to say that I am only a boy of 12 years of age, but I think I can judge what is good for the country. About the Army and Navy, I think the United States ought to build a couple of war ships each year. I read in the papers how other nations are building ships one right after each other.

JAMES GIFFEN.

Why not have fewer orations and more deeds in Congress?

BARNET HOUSE.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AYRES. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Are these forms of questions all alike?

Mr. AYRES. They are all alike.

Mr. DALZELL. I observe you did not ask your constituents what their views are on the tariff on sugar.

Mr. AYRES. I will say to the gentleman that the reason for that is that the sugar matter came up after the blanks were printed.

Mr. DALZELL. The sentiment is the same as to that?

Mr. AYRES. Entirely. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRE].

Mr. DUPRE. Mr. Chairman, it is very fair on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], with full knowledge of my opposition to the pending bill, to yield me time out of his allowance, and I am grateful. I only wish that some such spirit of fairness had animated the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means in the preparation and submission of this bill, which is so unfair to the district that I represent and to the people of the whole State of Louisiana. [Applause on the Republican side.]

My tenure in this body has been brief, dating back only to the third session of the Sixty-first Congress. It has been my pleasure and privilege in that time to witness the dying gasps of a repudiated Republican majority and to hail the advent into power of a reunited Democracy in this House. Since December, 1910, I have sought in an humble and unobtrusive way to cooperate with my party leaders in this body and to vote with them on all party measures. The record will disclose no contrary vote. I have yielded my own ideas to their more seasoned judgment at times when I thought that they were wrong, and I have not hesitated, at the risk of serious political jeopardy to myself, to follow them when I believed they were right.

For instance, in the last Congress when Canadian reciprocity was first proposed and at a time when sentiment thereon had not crystallized in my district, but, on the contrary, was widely divergent, I voted in the Democratic caucus and in the House for Canadian reciprocity. I did not believe that a Tariff Board was necessary to revise the tariff, and, accordingly, in the Sixty-first Congress I voted "present" when the roll was called on that measure, pairing, as a matter of convenience to him, with the gentleman from Illinois, my friend Mr. RODENBERG, who favored such a board. I was in most excellent Democratic company. That my view was correct and that no Tariff Board is necessary has since been shown by the many admirable measures which the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee have heretofore presented to this House without the assistance of any Tariff Board.

I favored the publicity of campaign expenses, not only in theory but in practice, and so when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], in the present Congress, presented an amendment to include within the provisions of the pending bill publicity of expenses incurred in primaries as well as general elections, I voted for his amendment. It was only at the urgent solicitation of those high in authority in this House that I consented to reverse myself and voted for the motion to recommit, and I have noted with satisfaction the vindication of my original attitude as shown by the subsequent action of the Democratic majority of the House in agreeing to the conference report, which substantially incorporated the Jackson amendment. I voted against the Sherwood pension bill, and I believe that in so doing I was acting with the best Democratic thought in this House and in this country. I advert to these matters in no spirit of criticism of others, in no spirit of laudation of myself, and certainly in no desire to apologize for my present attitude, but merely to emphasize the regret which I feel now that the parting of the ways has come.

I confess, however, that the poignancy of my regret is greatly tempered by the conviction that it is not I who am leaving the reservation, but that it is the Democratic majority of this House that is abandoning it and leaving six Democrats from Louisiana and three Democrats from Colorado to hold the fort. It is not I who am departing from the traditions of the Democratic Party for more than half a century, so far as free sugar is concerned. It is not I who am violating the provisions of the Denver platform—the last authoritative pronouncement of the Democratic Party. It is not I who am repudiating the precedents set by the Democratic majority in this Congress when it fathered and supported bills for the gradual reduction of wool and steel and textile fabrics and chemicals, and so forth.

From the Democratic viewpoint, sugar has always been regarded as the ideal revenue producer, and so has always been subject to an import duty. Even when the Republicans enacted the McKinley tariff law, and sugar for the first time was put upon the free list, the injustice that would be worked was recognized by the award of a bounty, a subsidy, to which I am absolutely opposed, as my people were at that time. The Denver platform, as we all know, declared for a gradual reduction of tariff duties, and when it meant to single out a particular industry to be put upon the free list that industry was specifically mentioned, as, for instance, in the case of lumber. It contained no plank for free sugar. The majority of this House has, in other tariff legislation submitted, adhered to the Denver platform and provided for a gradual reduction of duties. Why is sugar alone picked out to be put upon the free list? Why has the sugar industry been marked for destruction?

We are told in explanation that there is a tremendous sentiment in this country in favor of free sugar, as shown by the thousands and tens of thousands of petitions on file with the Ways and Means Committee and sent to individual Members of Congress.

I believe, in the first place, that many of these are of artificial growth and are the results of the agitation conducted by one Frank Lowry, self-styled secretary of the Wholesale Grocers' Association and self-admitted representative of Spreckels, the sugar king.

And, in the second place, I want to say that I do not believe in government by initiative but in representative government, with due consideration of the wishes not only of a certain part of the people but with a view to meting out justice to all the people. This legislation is sought to be justified by the present high cost of living and the corresponding necessity of reducing the duty on food products. Living should be made cheaper; but I, for one, have not seen in this body any serious attempt since Canadian reciprocity was defeated by the action of the Dominion, to reduce the duty on meat or flour or other food products. It is further contended that sugar should be placed upon the free list because of the rapacity of the Sugar Trust, whose illegal methods and operations are undoubtedly one of the greatest scandals of latter-day business. I have absolutely no sympathy for or interest in the Sugar Trust, nor have the cane growers and sugar manufacturers of Louisiana. Why should they be ruined in order to punish the Sugar Trust? The recent hearings before the Hardwick investigating committee disclosed conclusively that there is no collusion between the sugar interests of Louisiana and the American Sugar Refining Co.—no connection at all between them, except such connection as exists when a highwayman holds up a wayfarer on a lonely road and at the peril of his life makes him stand and deliver. Even the Columbus of the Sugar Trust, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], rabid advocate of free sugar as he is, will admit that the hearings before his committee showed that the cane growers and sugar manufacturers of Louisiana have no greater enemy than the Sugar Trust, except possibly the gentlemen who are about to vote for this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the sugar industry of Louisiana represents an investment of hundreds of millions of dollars—money invested on the faith of a consistent course of fair dealing adopted by the Congress of the United States to that industry. The Louisiana sugar crop means from ten to twenty millions of dollars per annum to the people of the city of New Orleans, whom I represent in part on this floor. I for one do not propose to see the State of Louisiana and the people of my district garroted and crucified in any such manner as is proposed by this free-sugar bill if I can prevent it. I will not, under the persuasive argument of party fealty, vote for a measure which contravenes the principles and platforms of that party and at the same time imports ruin and disaster to my constituency. I much prefer to receive the sneers and taunts of those self-sufficient gentlemen who question the sincerity of the Louisiana Democracy and who would seek to read Democratic Representatives from Louisiana out of the Democratic Party. I do not intend to and I will not be read out of the Democratic Party. I propose to stay in the Democratic Party, doing what I can to prevent it from making such tremendous economic and political blunders as the majority of this House is about to commit.

In conclusion I wish to make it clear that my unalterable opposition to this measure is not coupled with any hostility to the proposed excise tax. I shall vote for that measure, and I hope that it will accomplish the objects desired by its champions and sponsors and that it will stand the tests of the courts. I trust that it will reach those persons whom it should first reach—those persons who unquestionably would be made to disgorge under the operation of an income tax sanctioned by constitutional warrant. I believe in an income tax. I stand now where I did when a member of the General Assembly of Louisiana. I was speaker of the house of representatives of my State when the question of ratifying the income-tax amendment was presented and with a large majority of that body I voted for its ratification. Soon may the day come when it will receive the approval of a sufficient number of States to give Congress the authority and permission to impose, if necessary, an undisguised income tax that will reach all classes of our population and not depend for its legality on speculations and predictions as to the attitude of the Supreme Court of the United States as presently or hereafter constituted.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to say that I intend to support this bill. However, I expect that I shall be absent to-morrow when the vote is taken, and therefore I desire to go on record now in favor of the bill.

I support this measure, first, because I believe it is right, because it is in keeping with the desires and sentiment of the people of my district, who are in favor of removing all taxes from the necessaries of life; the Federal Government has neither legal nor moral right to tax the food that goes on the table or the clothing that covers the bodies of the people; and, secondly, because the people of my district, by petitions numbering into the thousands, have requested me so to vote. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I favor this bill. It is an assault upon the Sugar Trust and a corresponding help to the American people who have suffered for years from the burdens of taxation in order that millions might be multiplied in the hands of a few men. This Democratic House, under the inspiring leadership of its distinguished Speaker, CHAMP CLARK, and OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, has endeavored to put upon the statute books laws that would lift the burden of taxation from the backs of those least able to bear it and place it on the shoulders of those fortunate enough to have comfortable means and who would never feel any burden from the imposition of an insignificant tax. We want to make possible a decent living for the average man. Nothing that the Democratic majority in this House has attempted to do deserves such plaudits from the American people as the bill now under consideration which, if made into law, will bring home to the tables of every family in the land the blessings of real tariff revision downward. The Payne-Aldrich tariff law and high prices are still with us, and are as much an issue in 1912 as they were in 1910. This legislation is designed to cut down the high cost of living, and on that issue a Republican majority was converted into a Democratic majority in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And we will continue this fight for the people, though we have a Republican Senate and President to challenge our efforts.

The Sugar Trust formerly competed with the beet-sugar industry, of which we have heard so much on the floor of this House, and which has its champions from the States where that industry is paramount, demonstrating again the old saying that "Congress is but a convention of local envoys." I understand that when it was in competition with the beet-sugar industry it was vociferous in its demands for free sugar; but now that it controls the beet-sugar industry, its voice is not heard for free sugar; but a greater voice than that of the trust is heard for free sugar, and that is the voice of the American people, crying out against the domination of this corporation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Sugar Trust furnishes an example of unparalleled greed in the history of protection. Not satisfied with the levy imposed upon the American people through the allowance and the sufferance of the Republican Party, it proceeded to rob the Government of millions by false weights, and since that robbery it has disgorged over $2,000,000, in all probability but a modicum of its ill-gotten gains. To-day the spectacle is presented of directors and ex-directors of the Sugar Trust standing at the criminal bar of the United States courts, pleading to an indictment of a violation of the anti-trust laws, and I take occasion to call the attention of this House to the language of the United States district attorney, who characterized them as sneaks, as conspirators, and as breakers of the tenth commandment: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house."

The testimony taken before the special committee of investigation makes positively plain the fact that the consumer pays the tax. More than $130,000,000 are taken from the pockets of the American people annually to satisfy the insatiable greed of this sugar corporation. It is well at this time to dwell upon the taxes levied on some commodities, some necessaries, and some luxuries under the Payne-Aldrich tariff. Sugar bears a tax of 78.87 per cent, while diamonds are taxed but 10 per cent. I do not know how any advocate of protection, no matter if he were mad in its advocacy, could justify such a system of taxation. [Applause.] Statuary and rare paintings are taxed but 15 per cent, while the sweet necessity of the men who work and toil, the only quasi luxury in fact that some of them ever enjoy, sugar, is taxed at this exorbitant rate of 78.87 per cent.

The following table well illustrates the tremendous difference in taxation on sugar, used by all, and the many luxuries used by the few:

Duty on—	Per cent.
Sugar	78.87
Automobiles	45
Furs	50
Rare paintings and statuary	15

If this bill becomes a law, and, of course, it has to run the gantlet of the much-used veto of President Taft, it would effect a saving of about 2 cents per pound to the American people on the amount of sugar they consumed last year. This Democratic free-sugar bill means that the housewife purchasing 10 pounds of sugar, for which she now pays 60 cents, could buy the same quantity for 40 cents. The saving to a family of five persons, figuring the consumption for each person at 81.6 pounds, would be over $8 per year.

Free sugar would stimulate the industry of canned and preserved fruits, and it is well to remember that at the time the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was being enacted the National Canners' Association—which numbers nearly 3,000 firms—at their annual convention in Louisville, Ky., passed a resolution urging Congress to abolish the duty on raw and refined sugar because, as stated in their resolution:

> It is greatly desired to offer the product of our factories to the consumer at the lowest possible cost.

The National Food Manufacturers adopted a similar resolution.

Free sugar would develop our export trade in jellies, jams, and other preserved fruits and would increase the demand for labor. Other industries which enter into the canning and preserving industry would be correspondingly benefited. In this class might be enumerated tin plate, glassware, labels, and cases.

That the consumer would get the benefit of the removal of the tax on sugar is established by expert testimony before the special committee. Mr. Wallace P. Willett, a recognized sugar-statistical expert (Hearings, p. 3547), said:

> Whenever duty is taken off, the consumer gets the full benefit of the amount of duty taken off and also a part of the lower cost of refining.

Mr. Claus A. Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., an independent refinery (Hearings, p. 2245), said:

> I believe that if you were to make sugar free it would reduce the price of the sugar by the amount of duty.

To foster the beet-sugar and cane industry in the United States, which produces 1,717,000,000 pounds, less than one-quarter of the sugar annually consumed by the American people, we are asked to continue this extortionate tariff to the injury and detriment of 90,000,000 people.

The Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act levies these taxes:

Fresh beef, 1½ cents per pound.
Fresh mutton, 1½ cents per pound.
Fresh pork, 1½ cents per pound.
Hams, 4 cents per pound.
Bacon, 4 cents per pound.
Lard and compounds, 1½ cents per pound.
Sausage (except bologna), 25 per cent.
Flour, 25 per cent.
Bread, biscuits, wafers, 20 per cent.
Buckwheat flour, 25 per cent.
Oatmeal, 1 cent per pound.
Salt, 33 to 80 per cent.
Shoes, 10 per cent.
Sewing machines, 30 per cent.
Harness and saddlery, 20 to 35 per cent.
Wagons and carts, 45 per cent.
Lumber (average on rough and dressed), $2 per thousand feet.

This Democratic House placed these articles upon the free list in response to the demand of the American people for relief from excessive tariff taxation. Between the adverse vote of the Republican Senate and the veto of a Republican President this beneficent measure met its doom. A further effort on the part of the Democratic Party to relieve the people of the payment of over $50,000,000 annually in tariff taxes on cotton and woolen goods, including everything worn from a sock to a hat, met the same fate. In spite of the President's own declaration that the woolen schedule was indefensible, the President saw fit to veto a measure which passed both the House and Senate, and which was designed to correct the very abuses which he himself criticized. The same Executive disapproval was given to the cotton bill, designed to give cheaper clothing to the people, and providing a tariff rate sufficient to meet the difference in the wage cost between this country and Europe. The trusts demanded that no reduction be made, and the President vetoed these beneficent measures. The common people have no rights or interests which tariff-fed industries are bound to respect. The stand-patters say of them:

> "Take them up tenderly,
> Touch them with care;
> Tax them but slenderly,
> Funds come from there."

[Laughter and applause.]

The people who use sugar have paid these taxes from 1897 to 1910 (date of latest Statistical Abstract of the United States):

A tax of $750,000,000 paid on sugar in 14 short years!

Is it any wonder that the cost of living is high and that the great body of the people are poor? This tax is equal to $53,000,000 per year, duty actually paid into the Treasury of the United States upon imported dutiable sugar. But this is not our entire load of sugar taxation. We have sugar which pays the Government no tax, as follows:

	Pounds.
Beet sugar	1,024,938,000
Cane sugar	750,400,000
Hawaiian sugar	1,110,594,466
Porto Rican sugar	569,039,881
Philippine sugar	175,869,739

On this quantity of raw sugar, untaxed by the Government, there is placed a tax of 1.9 cents per pound by the refiners, who take advantage of the import tax of 1.9 cents on refined sugar, little or none of which is imported into this country, to increase the price to the consumer. This refined-sugar tax keeps the American sugar market in possession of the Sugar Trust.

From Cuba and other countries come 3,918,593,677 pounds, which are taxed at the customhouse. Our domestic sugar, together with the sugar of our insular possessions, when added to the sugar imported from Cuba and other countries, makes a total of 7,549,435,763 pounds. Deduct from this total the amount exported, 189,308,952 pounds, and we have left for American consumption 7,360,126,811 pounds, every pound of which is taxed at the rate of 1.9 cents per pound, so far as the consumer is concerned, making a grand total of more than $139,000,000 paid annually as a sugar tax by the American people. The United States Treasury gets but $53,000,000 of this money, and the balance, about $86,000,000, is paid to the sugar manufacturers of Louisiana, the beet-sugar manufacturers of the West, the rich planters of Porto Rico, Hawaii, the Philippine Islands, and, last but not least, to the American sugar refiners, commonly known as the Sugar Trust, which, it is needless to say, gets the lion's share.

All of this money can be saved to the people by this Democratic free-sugar bill, which will reduce the price of sugar to all the people 2 cents a pound. Sugar is one of the necessities of life and should be free from all taxation. Let the tax-gatherer reach out his hand to the swollen fortunes of those who have more than plenty and give the ordinary consumer a chance. We ask as a substitute revenue measure for the sugar tax a tax on all incomes over $5,000 a year. Such a tax will be just, equitable, and fair. Poor indeed must be the patriotism of the man who, making from his business over $5,000 per year, would begrudge the Government a tax of 1 per cent on all over $5,000. A person having an income of less than $5,000 per year would pay nothing.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say that in the State of Rhode Island, one of the districts of which I have the honor to represent, there is a registration law which compels men to register on or before the 30th day of June in order to be qualified for voting in November. I believe that all the legislation that has been enacted by the Democratic majority of this House, including this legislation, will appeal to my constituents, and in order that they may be fully qualified to discharge their duties in November I appeal to the voters of Rhode Island to register on or before June 30, 1912, so that they may cast their ballots for the Democratic ticket in November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAINEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent that portion of the State of Maryland embracing the northern section of the city of Baltimore. In Maryland we nominate our candidates by direct vote of the people by a method known to us as the Crawford County system, which gives to the voters the choice of their candidates for office. In this way our officials stand close to the people they represent, looking to them for selection as well as election. Under this system it is customary for the various candidates for nomination to issue a statement or platform, setting forth their attitude toward the subjects of public importance confronting the people and pledging their policy in the solution of these questions.

The high cost of living is a subject which the people of my district regard as of paramount importance, and, representing, as I do, both the wealthy and the plain people of our city and State, it was my pledge to them when seeking nomination as a Representative in this Congress that I would, in so far as the power lay in me, by work, action, and vote, endeavor to relieve from taxation as fast as the revenues of the Government would permit those articles termed the necessaries of life, and thereby remove from their stomachs and backs this unrighteous, unwarranted, and inhuman burden. In accordance with that pledge to my constituency I welcome the opportunity now afforded this House to say whether or not sugar shall be placed on the free list; and in voting for the removal of the present tax, as I shall do, I desire to submit to this Chamber a statement of the causes which influence me to this action.

RESULTS OF PROTECTION.

In his interesting account Dean Swift tells us how Capt. Gulliver, that illustrious voyager, cast by chance upon the shores of Lilliput, fell into a sleep, from which he awoke to discover himself the captive of a diminutive people by comparison with whom he was an immense giant. Despite his massive bulk and overtowering strength, he found that during his interval of unconsciousness he had been securely bound, the victim of those who, in the rage of his predicament, he fain would have destroyed.

To-day we behold the most prosperous Nation in the world aroused from a period of political adolescence to find itself in the historic predicament of Capt. Gulliver. Awakened at last, the people of these United States discover themselves the prostrate victims of law-defying trusts, illegal combines, and tariff-created monopolies, whose ensnaring meshes render them powerless to escape their exactions; and though, like Gulliver, they possess the strength to tear their enemies asunder, they are for the moment unable to move and can utter only a roar.

This spectacle is the legitimate product of a fair trial of years' duration of the protective-tariff policy of the Republican Party. Within that period, which might properly be termed the "golden age" of trusts, combines, and monopolies, the domination of Congress in the interest of the great industrial organizations of this country was so nearly absolute as to fairly warrant the inference that we were deteriorating from a government of man to a government by property. It is true that in the rearrangement of affairs made necessary by changed conditions the wages of labor have advanced, but nowhere in proportion to the increased cost of living. The balance is on the wrong side of the ledger.

TARIFF AND TRUSTS.

I do not believe my Republican friends will deny that the fertile soil of tariff protection has given root to those industrial consolidations termed "trusts." Likewise, I do not believe that my friends on the other side of this House will deny the statement that accompanying the advent of trusts has come the increase in the cost of the necessities of life. Investigations conducted by agents of this Government reveal these conditions and expose to the public the well-oiled machinery by which the people have been systematically plundered through arbitrary advances in price dictated by no other reason than the desire to secure abnormal profits. It is said, Mr. Chairman, "Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small." It is a hopeful augury of the return of better conditions that the Sugar Trust, the Tobacco Trust, and the Oil Trust have been haled into the courts and punished to some extent for their iniquitous and illegal acts, and that the Steel Trust is now awaiting its turn.

But the punishment they have sustained will hardly deter them from a renewal of their guilt if conditions are to remain such as to make possible a repetition of their offenses. It has been said, "Opportunity makes the thief," and I believe that it is admitted as equally truthful that the "tariff breeds monopoly and monopoly creates trusts." Therefore to strike at the root of the evil we must remove the primary cause, and that is the tariff.

THE SUGAR TRUST.

Of all trusts that have reared their heads under the vicious principle of tariff protection, no other one has so completely embraced all classes of the American people as the Sugar Trust. Its remorseless tentacles exact tribute from every age of mankind, ranging from the infant in the cradle to the feeble patriarch on the brink of the grave. I am glad that in this Congress we are to-day taking the first and most important step toward protecting the American people from a continuance of its rapacity.

In defense of the sugar industry the Republican Party contends that if we deprive it of tariff protection we will destroy one of the country's valuable industrial assets. They believe that such an industry has a right to protection, even though such protection may involve the taxation of the whole American people. The Democratic Party denies this right. It holds that the power to tax was incorporated in our Constitution for the sole purpose of producing revenue to run this Government, economically administered, and that taxation for any other object is not within the purview and intent of those who framed our Constitution. It does not believe that the people of these United States should be taxed in order that special privileges may be extended to any business, any industry, or any class of people.

Special privilege is the rock upon which monarchies are founded. It is incompatible with the theory of our form of government.

Let us examine briefly the operation of the present law under which the sugar industry is protected by the tariff.

The present annual consumption in the United States is set down at 3,500,000 tons, derived from the following sources:

	Tons.
Raw cane, duty paying, chiefly from Cuba	1,800,000
Raw cane, domestic, from Porto Rico	300,000
Raw cane, domestic, from Louisiana	300,000
Raw cane, domestic, from Hawaiian Islands	500,000
Total cane sugar	2,900,000
Beet sugar produced in United States	600,000
Total	3,500,000

If the Government got the benefit of this protective tariff in its entirety and received about 1½ cents from each pound which the consumer buys, then conditions would not be quite so inequitable; but the fact is that while the duty destroys all possibility of foreign competition the Sugar Trust—which controls the market—fixes the selling price of all its product at an amount not less than the price of the foreign product plus the tariff. In this way the Sugar Trust collects on the 3,500,000 tons it sells to the American people an amount aggregating about $115,000,000. It pays duty only on the 1,800,000 tons imported from Cuba, amounting to about $53,000,000. Thus by this transaction it is enabled to put the remaining $62,000,000 into its pockets as profits.

But some will say—and may I say it is good Republican doctrine—"We should foster and protect the Louisiana planters and the beet-sugar growers." Let us consider them. These planters and growers furnish about one-fourth of the sugar consumed in the United State. As the duty is over 1½ cents per pound, it means that our Republican friends would continue to saddle the American people with a tax equivalent to over 6 cents per pound to benefit the limited few and foster these two American industries.

THE LOUISIANA PLANTERS.

The Louisiana planters of sugar cane have received the fostering care of the Government through protection or bounty for over a hundred years, at a cost to the American people of hundreds of millions of dollars. Yet this industrial infant is crying as lustily as ever for tariff favors. Though this industry has been the recipient of this hothousing process for a century, it is to-day producing only about 8½ per cent of the sugar we require. Surely it is high time that we should return to that Jeffersonian doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Upward of 80 per cent of the property of the beet-sugar industry is owned or controlled by the Sugar Trust. Last year the beet-sugar industries earned about 16 per cent on their stock, one-half of which is watered, earnings equivalent, therefore, to 32 per cent on the actual money invested. It is consequently apparent that the removal of the tariff on sugar is not likely to greatly affect them.

Mr. Chairman, our esteemed leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, in answer to Mr. RUCKER's question, "When does an industry become an adult?" speaking in reference to the beet-sugar industry, replied: "The time when these industries were really infants runs to a time when the memory of the present generation runneth not to the contrary."

"But that is not so with the beet industry," said Mr. RUCKER.

"They are all 'beat' industries," interjected Mr. JAMES, "beating the American people out of money."

This recalls the inordinate greed of the Sugar Trust and the truthfulness of Mr. JAMES's remark.

THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

This gigantic trust, the American Sugar Refining Co., has grown rich and opulent upon the special privileges and benefits dispensed to it under a system of protection promulgated by and sacred to the Republican Party, by means of which it has been enabled to exploit the American people and filch from them hundreds of millions of dollars. This trust, which stifles competition, closes down and dismantles refineries—as it has done at my own city of Baltimore—throwing out of employment hundreds of unfortunates who have secured homes in the vicinity, expecting permanent employment, is controlled by such insatiate greed that it stoops to tricks and devices to which the poorest dealer would spurn to resort. Not satisfied with the advantages obtained, its dupes criminally underweigh imported sugar so that its profits might be even greater than a beneficent Government allows.

It seems, however, that the old adage, "It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good," is especially applicable here. I have heard it said that the San Jose scale was a blessing to the fruit growers in that it compelled them to spray their trees and thereby obtain perfect fruit, which spraying they should have been doing always.

I have heard that the boll weevil was not as disastrous to the prosperity of Texas as at first feared. It compelled the farmers to grow a diversity of crops instead of placing their entire dependence in one crop. Having produced articles for home use, they were not compelled to send outside to buy.

Great political investigations, while disastrous to the immediate participants, have benefited the community at large in that they have cleared the political atmosphere and caused the passage of salutary laws, rendering repetition impossible in the future.

And so I believe that the outrageous fraud perpetrated against the Government by which the pockets of the Sugar Trust were crammed with ill-gotten gain has done as much to awaken the people of this country to a full realization of the true character of that corrupt organization as any other one thing. It helped to place the control of this House in our party, and the people of this country are looking to the Democratic Party to see whether or not it will redeem the pledges by which it came into power and whether they will be given relief from this burden they are now bearing.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the operation of trusts must have begun during the very early days of the history of man. Matthew, in his scriptural writing, xxiii, 4, uses language that so vividly describes the modern trust that he could have well had it in contemplation when he wrote:

> For they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers.

And that indictment is still true. The trusts, combines, and monopolies which have grown fat under the fostering care of protection will never move a finger to lift this grievous burden of taxation from the shoulders of the American people. Free sugar will lift one of these burdens. That was demonstrated under the McKinley tariff, when the duty was removed, and sugar immediately dropped 2 cents per pound, to the great relief of our people.

We are told, Mr. Chairman, by the patron saints of protection that sugar has always been regarded as one of the natural revenue producers of Government and that the present tax on sugar should therefore be retained in order that the Government may continue to receive the $53,000,000 now produced by such importation. The Democratic Party proposes to remove this duty from sugar, thereby lifting at the same time $115,000,000 taxes off the American people. They propose to replace this revenue through the imposition of an excise tax levied against those doing business as individuals and copartnerships whose incomes are in excess of $5,000 annually.

WHERE THE TAX BELONGS.

I have always believed that the bulk of taxation should be borne by those of large means and great incomes, and that those of limited means, earning their living by the sweat of their brow and by their brawn and muscle creating the wealth of the world, should be freed from this burden as far as possible. It was for this reason that I took pleasure in voting, when a member of the legislature of my State, for that resolution providing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as the income amendment, giving to the National Government the right to tax incomes.

And why is this not the true principle of taxation? Is not a very large part of the revenues of Government expended in the protection of property and property rights from which these incomes are derived? And does not this protection inure to the benefit of the owners of the property?

An excise tax upon the corporate business of the country has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, and now the Democratic Party proposes to create an excise tax upon all individual and copartnership business whose incomes are in excess of $5,000 annually, which merely extends and makes more complete and equitable the corporation-tax law by applying it to all business, whether conducted by a corporation, individual, or firm. Certainly there can be no objection nor any constitutional prohibition. A corporation is nothing more or less than a combination of individuals doing business, and if constitutional to tax the business of a corporation, the same rule would apply with equal force to business when conducted by an individual or firm.

God in His wise providence has seen fit to endow our land with vast natural resources, such as gold, silver, copper, and iron. Mines producing untold wealth, oil wells from which fabulous fortunes have been amassed, have contributed in part to the material blessings of our people. Waterfalls and fast-flowing streams have been harnessed by the inventive genius of man, and the hydroelectric power thus secured used to light cities and towns and villages for miles around, furnishing the substitute by which is relieved the muscles of many toilers and making possible illuminating effects that have become the wonder of the age.

These things has nature given us. Man has merely preempted them. Through this acquisition of easy wealth, as well as through other channels, tremendous fortunes have accumulated that are steadily growing in magnitude year by year, yet failing to pay to Government by way of tax their just proportion for that protection and security which makes possible their peaceful enjoyment.

Justice is the greatest charity that man can give. To take the burden of taxation off the income of the man of small means and place it upon this great accumulation of idle wealth is manifestly right and proper.

PLEDGES FULFILLED.

Reviewing the activities of the Democratic Party during the year it has been in power, I find ample in that record to sustain the confidence of the people. In accordance with its pledges to reduce the cost of living it has passed bills providing for a lower tariff on wool and cotton, a farmers' free list bill, a steel bill, a revision of the chemical schedule, and a number of other important measures essential to the general welfare of the country. There can be no doubt that the one big issue before the country to-day is that of the tariff. So far the Democratic Party has promptly and courageously discharged every obligation in the platform on which it came into power. It is on this record, fully and faithfully carried out, that it will seek a continuation of the people's good will in order that it may finish the work so well begun.

Mr. Chairman, since I have been a member of this Congress I have endeavored to take an active part in its proceedings and to fully and fairly and impartially represent all the people of my district. When this session is ended I shall be able to return to them with a record of votes cast, measures enacted into law, and things accomplished for my district from which they can determine for themselves whether I have proven a worthy representative of their interests, entitled to a continuance of their suffrage.

I will be able to tell them that I have secured the authorization of the necessary survey preliminary to the widening of the important York Spit channel leading to the port of Baltimore; that I am practically assured a change of the present undesirable site for our immigration station and the erection of adequate buildings fully in harmony with the important position of Baltimore as a port of immigrant entry; that I have taken a prominent part in that great national movement under way for good roads, my bill setting forth my ideas as to the treatment of that subject being accorded particular commendation by such national journals as Colliers and the Saturday Evening Post; that I have advocated that the memorial authorized by Congress to Abraham Lincoln be in the form of a great highway from Washington to Gettysburg, a practical and enduring tribute to his memory; that as an active participant in the work of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association I have helped direct the attention of the country to Maryland's intense interest in its plan of waterway improvement; that through the bill which I introduced in the House of Representatives many hospitals of Baltimore, maintained largely through charitable donations, will have had remitted fines imposed for the technical violation of the alcohol-tax law, amounting to many thousands of dollars, while the hospitals of the country at large will profit to the extent of upward of a million dollars or more; that I have made extensive distribution among my constituents of the valuable and instructive literature issued by the Government. In this record, relating particularly to my district, I take pride. But all this I count as naught in comparison with my support of those measures designed to relieve the people of the tax on their stomachs and backs, and particularly of my support of this bill, which, if passed by the Senate and signed by the President, will relieve the 92,000,000 people of our country from that daily and almost hourly burden.

PROTECTION OF OUR MERCHANT MARINE.

The Panama Canal—that engineering wonder of the world—will soon be finished and opened to the commerce of all nations. Great functions are being arranged to celebrate its opening, and I hope to be there. But I fear I shall be much disappointed when I see great ships plowing through its channels bearing the flags of all nations and behold the absence of many bearing the Star-Spangled Banner, because a tariff system inaugurated and maintained by the Republican Party has practically driven our merchant marine from the high seas. I want to see the policy of the Democratic Party adopted by legislating for the masses and not for the classes and special interests. I want to see the harbor of Baltimore filled as it was under the old régime with ships of burden from every clime; her factories busy producing goods and wares for the markets of the world and not restricted to production for home consumption alone.

Carved in granite on the front of Union Station in Washington is the motto:

He that would bring home the wealth of the Indies, must carry the wealth of the Indies with him.

And so it is. If we would sell to the world, we must destroy our obsolete protective tariff walls and enter into trade relations with all nations, thereby requiring the production of more goods and giving employment to more workmen and more producers. We must be willing to buy from them and to use the goods and wares which they have to exchange if we would have them use the products of American labor.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 23 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE].

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, for the first time during my two terms of service in this House I feel it incumbent upon me to oppose in part the action of the Democratic caucus of Friday, March 1, last, to wit, in so far as its recommendation of H. R. 21213, a measure to place sugar upon the free list, is concerned.

It gives me pleasure to state that, in so far as the other measure recommended by that caucus is concerned—H. R. 21214, a measure to levy a special excise tax on incomes—it meets with my hearty approval, and I shall vote for it with great satisfaction, though possibly some of the "committee of wholesale grocers," of which Mr. Frank C. Lowrey is pseudo secretary, may prefer that I should refrain from so doing.

In failing to abide by the caucus action of my party on this occasion, I am in no sense transgressing the rules of our party organization in this House, as such rules very wisely provide that where a member of our party has made pledges to his constituents prior to his election, which pledges would be contravened were such Member to vote as the caucus has directed, he may, after proper notice given of his intentions so to do, refuse to abide by such caucus action. I have complied with the rules of the Democratic caucus in that respect, and as my friends and colleagues on this side of the Chamber well know, I am still "on the reservation."

Mr. Chairman, I wish to register at this time and in this place my most vigorous protest against the passage of the measure first referred to—H. R. 21213—a bill which at one "fell swoop" places sugar upon the free list.

The enactment into law at this time of such a measure, coming as it does without notice or warning of any kind to the producers of that article save since the caucus action of March 1, finding all those engaged in the culture of sugar cane in my State totally unprepared therefor, would for these and many other reasons work ruin to the uttermost in the cane-growing section of my State and my district. The State of Louisiana produced in the year 1910 a crop of 325,000 tons of cane sugar, in round numbers, of a gross value, including the by-products of the cane, of approximately $30,000,000.

Five of the twelve parishes composing the district which I have the honor to represent produced in that same year approximately 60,000 tons of sugar, nearly one-fifth of all the cane sugar produced in the United States in that year, and of a gross value of over $5,000,000. I take the year 1910, as that is the last year for which the most accurate figures are now available by parishes.

In addition to the land cultivated in cane in my district, there are situated therein not less than 50 mills engaged in the manufacture of cane sugar or cane sirup. To give an accurate estimate of the value of these mills would be a difficult matter, and I have no figures from any reliable source available at this time so that I could give same in detail. It is safe to say, however, bearing in mind the above limitations on the estimate, that these mills alone, separate from the surrounding lands, represent an outlay of from seven to ten million dollars, exclusive of land values.

Should this measure become a law it would mean the end of cane culture in my district, and the consequential abandonment of all these costly buildings and the surrendering of them to "bats and owls." And however it may be contended that these lands can be turned into other crops, it must be remembered that leaving out the entire matter of improvements referred to, it takes three years to get into cane culture, and it takes three years to go out of cane culture.

To say that this great agricultural industry would not be wiped out by such a law as this enacted at this time is to urge a most illogical proposition; for you would thereby place the cane grower in a position where he must buy, as he has hitherto bought, in a protected market practically everything which he consumes, and must sell in a free-trade market all that he produces.

Every article of importance which he requires, from the plow in the field, which turns the furrow for planting, to the centrifugal in the sugar mill, which ultimately yields up the manufactured product, is on the dutiable list. Every chain in the carrier, every boiler, flywheel, engine, crusher, roller, vacuum pan, filter press, and centrifugal, and the innumerable other parts of the machinery, and so forth, that go to make up the total essentials of the modern sugar mill were purchased in a protected market; and now you would force the cane grower, not by a gradual reduction of the duty, as called for in the Democratic platform, but at one stroke of the free-trade pen, to compete with all the world, with Java, where labor is paid 12 cents per day, and with Cuba, Russia, Germany, and other countries given an equal footing in the American market, and at the same time enjoying many artificial advantages in addition to whatever natural advantages as to climate they may possess over the American cane grower.

I believe the enactment into law of this measure at this time would be as harsh a policy, or even more harsh, than any civilized country has ever adopted toward its citizens or subjects.

The Democratic leaders in the last national convention must have given due consideration to the effect of such legislation, and must have had same in mind when they took the broad and generous view that however contrary to their ideas of economics may have been the method of fostering industries by a protective tariff, they realized that many industries of this country had been so fostered, and however wrong and repugnant to their ideas of taxation the system may have been, nevertheless, realizing that to suddenly and radically change to anything like a free-trade basis would mean ruin and disaster for the time being at least, they very wisely adopted a plank at the Denver convention in 1908 declaring for gradual reduction and not for free trade.

Hence, whatever may be the criticism of the protective tariff system and however indefensible our leaders in that convention may have considered the system by which different industries of the country had been fostered, the Democratic Party gave its solemn pledge to the country that gradual reduction and not sudden and radical free trade would be the policy of our party. Therefore I assert that this measure is directly in contradiction of the letter and spirit of the last national Democratic platform. [Applause.]

I am not contending that the platform of the Democratic Party under any interpretation whatsoever can be construed into meaning that the sugar schedule should not be revised. From a strictly Democratic point of view it is difficult to defend either the duty on refined sugar or the Dutch standard, as contained in the present schedule, as revenue producers. I realize fully that the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee look upon this matter almost solely from the standpoint of the revenue which the duty on an article produces. Their ideal maxim has hitherto seemed to be: "A minimum of duty consistent with a maximum of revenue." Therefore I submit that, in view of the Democratic platform of 1908 and the Democratic ideal just defined, and so often advocated by Democrats upon this floor, that the pending measure is absolutely repugnant to the above doctrine. The Dutch standard and the duty on refined sugar do not result in the production of revenue to the Government, about $60,000 being collected from the duty on refined sugar last year. But the duty on what is commonly known as raw sugar is right now at a point where it is the most ideal revenue producer of the entire dutiable list, from agate to zinc, the revenue derived therefrom adding annually to the Treasury between fifty and sixty millions of dollars, the amount for the years ending June 30, 1909, June 30, 1910, and June 30, 1911, for example, being, in round numbers, $56,000,000, $52,600,000, and $52,000,000, respectively.

This enormous revenue is derived almost entirely from importations of 96° test sugars, the duty thereon being 1.68½; that is to say, 1.68 cents per pound, importations from Cuba enjoying a 20 per cent reduction.

Now, let us see if this has been practically demonstrated to come within the definition of "A minimum of duty consistent with a maximum of revenue." Under the provisions of the last Democratic tariff measure to become law, the Wilson bill, the duty was 40 per cent ad valorem, and the importations during the three years' existence of that law were, respectively, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, 563,639 tons; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, 1,772,081 tons; and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, 2,243,854 tons, none of which was either free or preferential; and the revenues therefrom for these years were, respectively, $15,000,000, $30,000,000, and $41,000,000, in round numbers, the average being $29,000,000 per annum, which was yielded from a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem. Under the present duty on raw sugar the importations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, amounted to 1,685,000 tons; for the succeeding year, 2,094,000 tons; and for the succeeding year, 1,900,000 tons, in round numbers, and the revenues derived therefrom were $50,000,000, $56,000,000, and $53,000,000, respectively, notwithstanding the free sugar coming from Porto Rico and Hawaii, amounting to, approximately, an average of 700,000 tons annually for each of those respective years, and the duty-free sugar from the Philippines, which has been coming in since 1909 at the average rate of, say, 200,000 tons per annum. Yet, notwithstanding the enormous percentage of Cuban importations, averaging approximately 1,600,000 tons during the last four years, all of which enjoyed a preferential reduction of duty of 20 per cent, we find the National Treasury to be the recipient of larger revenues from the existing duty on raw sugars than ever before under any former duty. [Applause.]

Now, reducing, theoretically—for the purpose of this illustration—the present specific rate on raw or, rather, 96 test sugar, from 1.68½ specific to its equivalent ad valorem, we find it to amount to a duty of 53 per cent ad valorem. Therefore, we have tried in the most practical manner during the last 17 years both the 40 per cent ad valorem and the equivalent of a 53 per cent ad valorem, respectively, and we find that the former, even when favored by no free nor preferential importation interfering therewith, falls annually more than $24,000,000 below the 53 per cent equivalent, which yields a total of $53,000,000 annually. The difference is in reality greater than I have set forth here, as in many years the revenue has been over $60,000,000.

So we have before us not a mere theoretical idea, but the actual demonstration in recent years that a specific duty of 1.68½—the equivalent of 53 per cent ad valorem—is an ideal Democratic revenue duty, yielding a revenue most ample, and in thorough accord with the Democratic principle, "A minimum of duty consistent with a maximum of revenue," not building a tariff wall so high that none other may come in, nor constructing the fence so low that revenue to run the expenses of the Government will not be yielded amply. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the reasons which I have just given, there are further reasons that may be urged from the standpoint of our party and its declarations in the platform referred to which have recently been given emphasis in part by our distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which, according to my view, furnish strong argument why this measure should not pass this body.

The distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has stated with reference to the effect of the passage of this measure upon the products of domestic sugar:

> Placing sugar on the free list will reduce their profits, but it will not destroy the industry in the United States—thereby demonstrating that it is not the intention of the Democratic leaders to designedly destroy any industry in our country. In considering this an element to be taken into consideration, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] evidently had in mind that plank of the Democratic platform referred to, which reprobates the radical swing of the pendulum from protection to free trade.

By the above declaration the gentleman from Alabama at once opens the way to the discussion of the evil effects vel non which this radical legislation will have upon those interested in cane culture and sugar making.

The distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is, however, wholly in error with regard to the ultimate effect of this legislation. For instance, the Hardwick committee finds that the testimony before them from the cane growers of Louisana is to the effect that the cost of producing raw cane sugar in Louisiana—96 test—is 3¾ cents per pound. Now, the gentleman from Alabama claims that the placing of sugar upon the free list will cheapen the cost to the consumer 1½ cents per pound. As the average price even for granulated sugar during the past 10 years has been 5 cents, approximately, and as the cost of refining and passing through the refiner's hand must be added to the 3¾ cents cost of producing raw sugar, in making up the price of granulated it clearly appears that, taking the contention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], we find by analyzing the figures that the enactment of this measure into law would reduce the price of raw sugar so that it would be below the cost of production. Thus the immediate prostration and ruin of the entire agricultural section of my State and district in which sugar cane is grown, would follow. This measure, should it become a law at this particular time, would possibly result in more injury and disaster than anything which could happen in the cane-growing section of my district and State, for the following reasons:

With the advent of the cotton-boll weevil into my State our cotton crop went down from 1,000,000 bales, in round numbers, produced in the year 1904 to as low as one-quarter million bales in 1910; and in the 12 parishes which I have the honor to represent our yield dropped from 180,000 bales in the year 1904 to 10,000 bales in 1910. The relief from this appalling situation was in the main the diversification of crops, especially in so far as the alluvial section of my district was concerned. In the parishes of Pointe Coupee, West Baton Rouge, Iberville, Ascension, and parts of East Baton Rouge, where cane culture had been followed in part for many years with as fair profits as from the usual agricultural avocations, the cotton farmers in great numbers went into cane growing to a more or less extent. Thousands of small farmers owning 50 and 100 and 200 acre farms planted cane and with satisfactory results, selling their cane by tonnage or else on a basis of sugar content, to the different growers who operated mills, until to-day the small farmer is as vitally interested in this legislation as the man who owns many hundred acres. Take the parish of Pointe Coupee as an example—a parish which produced 60,000 bales of cotton in 1904 and only 7,000 bales in 1910—while the transition from cotton to cane is somewhat costly and necessitates different cultural methods, the culture of cane in the parish mentioned last, as well as those heretofore referred to, has been found to be a relief from the present inability of our people to raise cotton under boll-weevil conditions in the alluvial sections of my State and district.

While cane culture in the district which I represent is in the main confined to the western portion thereof, our farmers, not only in the parishes referred to, but all over the remainder of the 12, even in the upland parishes, are following, as one of the avenues of diversification, sirup making on a small scale, and while sirup is not made in large quantities, save in the alluvial section where the larger mills are situated, yet the smaller mills are to-day engaged in making some sirup for sale to local consumers as well as for home use in every parish of my district, while in the alluvial section brands of sirups, famous throughout the land, are made under most modern improved methods and by costly machinery.

However small the outfit of the humblest sirup maker in the pine lands of Louisiana may be, the passage of this measure will affect him in proportion to his circumstances and the amount of his product just as much as it will affect the owner and grower on the large plantations in proportion to investment, for sirups as well as sugar are placed on the free list by the provisions of this measure.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to disabuse the minds of the Members of this House of the false impression that many seem to have, to the effect that only a few large landed proprietors would be adversely affected by the passage of this legislation. Whatever of truth there may have been in such a statement with reference to conditions in former years, the facts are to-day as I have stated them, and thousands of our farmers in the alluvial sections of our State, who formerly grew cotton, are now growing cane as their staple product.

You are not striking down solely the large landed proprietors; you are including in the tumbrels of this revolutionary measure thousands of hard-working and industrious farmers who, when their cotton crops had been distroyed by the cotton-boll weevil, bravely turned to this avenue of agriculture instead of giving up in despair as some might have done, until to-day, all over the alluvial sections of Louisiana, the culture of cane has greatly increased. I admit that there are some men of large means who are engaged in this industry, though they are few in numbers in comparison with the number of individuals of small means who grow sugar cane.

There are men engaged in this pursuit who have been successful, and there are those similarly engaged upon whom fortune has not smiled; some have been successful through their own efforts, industry and thrift counting in this calling just as in any other, and likewise there have been those who, through no fault of their own, have been less fortunate than the first. But so it is with regard to every avocation which man may follow.

In considering the disaster resulting to my State, in the event this measure should become a law, it must be remembered that, in addition to the actual cane growers whom it would ruin, there will be also cut off from both common and skilled labor an important avenue of employment, while those who have made a specialty or profession of this important avenue of agriculture, such as sugar makers, sugar chemists, and so forth, will find themselves with no field for employment in the land of their nativity.

Thus coming right upon the heels of the boll-weevil disaster, which reduced Louisiana's cotton crop 75 per cent, the ruin of the cane-growing industry would see our State with her two main agricultural pursuits prostrate at the same time. In opposing this measure I am acting in no wise from any private selfish motive for gain to myself individually, but am serving the best interest of the people whom I represent.

In so far as any private interests of my own are concerned, I will say that I am not engaged in cane growing and have no moneyed interests whatsoever therein. I was reared on a cotton farm and still reside in the uplands of Louisiana. The parish of West Feliciana, where I reside, is only partially alluvial, though in those sections which are alluvial cane is grown as successfully as in any portion of the State.

The State farm, which is in my parish, has in recent years been placed under cane culture, changing from cotton to that industry for the reasons I have heretofore described, and only last year a sugar factory was erected by the State of Louisiana thereon at a cost of nearly $400,000. This represents an investment toward which every taxpayer in Louisiana has contributed, and on their behalf, also, I wish to again reiterate my protest against this legislation which once effective will mean a practically total loss of the large sum so expended.

A great deal has been said here upon this floor with reference to free-sugar legislation being a good way to get rid of the American Sugar Refining Co.'s monopoly.

Let me state right here that the American Sugar Refining Co., more familiarly known as the Sugar Trust, is the worst enemy the Louisiana cane grower has ever known. Not only has this grasping monopoly exacted for years from the Louisiana sugar producer 15 cents per 100 pounds on all sales made to that company, without warrant, consideration, or valid reason, other than its insatiable greed to exact tribute from those who are helpless to protect themselves, but they have in every covert and, in my opinion, illegal way known to the most artful dodger of the Sherman antitrust law, ground underfoot the Louisiana sugar producer for the trust's own private gain.

The methods of the American Tobacco Co. in the past toward the tobacco growers of Tennessee and other sections were not more reprehensible than those of the Sugar Trust toward the Louisiana producer; and as a crowning infamy we find this corporation caught red-handed in the act of smuggling sugar into the United States, thereby indirectly robbing the Federal Treasury of millions of dollars in just import duties and at the same time illegally bringing into the American market their raw material in direct competition with and in order to further beat down the price of the Louisiana producer of 96-test sugar. And now the Ways and Means Committee of the Democratic Party in this House, while honestly and sincerely believing that they were acting against the selfish interest of this gigantic monopoly, have innocently allowed themselves to be deceived into doing exactly what the Sugar Trust wanted them to do, namely, to admit their raw material duty free, so that they may have to resort to smuggling no more and thus avoid the toils of the law in the days to come, in so far as that particular offense is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I have read of the bold and daring, though heartless acts of the buccaneers of the Spanish main; I have listened as a child to the pathetic story of the death of the beautiful Theodosia Burr at the impious hands of the heartless outlaws of the high seas; I have as one of the earliest recollections of my childhood days in my Louisiana home still engraved upon my memory the story I learned at my parents' knee of Lafitte, the pirate and his daring band of bold bad men; I have never forgotten the story of Robin Hood and his brave man, Little John, who under the greenwood tree filched the pockets of the rich nobles and opulent merchants of merry England. But in all these men, while there may have been a preponderance of bad, there is some point somewhere in their careers that at least, to some extent, tempers our condemnation of their acts with admiration for their courage and magnanimity; there are some acts for good, or there is some day of repentence, somewhere in their history which causes one to draw the mantle of Christian charity over their faults and their crimes, and at times not only to forgive but even to admire them. Henry Morgan may have been a buccaneer in its true sense of the word, but he had courage and was at least a bold bad man who risked his life in the open; the heartless pirates who took the life of Theodosia Burr sailed in open defiance of all the civilized nations of the world, flying the flag of no country and committing depredations upon all, but their methods were those of the daring robber and not the methods of the sneak thief; Lafitte, whatever infamy may have attached to his early career, wiped out all stain upon his name by joining with old Andrew Jackson and risking his life in defense of yonder flag against a foreign foe, on January 8, 1815; Robin Hood may have robbed the rich traveler and despoiled the nobility wending their way through the forests of Nottinghamshire; but there was the good Friar Tuck to distribute the questionably acquired gate receipts among the poor and lowly according to their needs; but in all the career of this twentieth century smuggler there is but one trait that was ever disclosed, and that trait is insatiable greed for gold, and neither moral nor statute law could stay its hand. Those guilty individuals who doubtless profited most by its illegal acts, came not into the open nor bared their breasts to deadly weapon, as did the buccaneers of old; but calmly seated in some magnificently appointed office suite, had their nefarious work accomplished according to their subtle plans, by causing, forsooth, a number of poor miserable dupes to underweigh imported sugars, by means of spirals or springs as completely and artistically concealed as were the main beneficiaries of this resultant infamy. To those who would study the causes of the present social unrest, the spirit of seeming revolt against almost all organized authority, as well as against the existing order of things in our country, I would recommend the history of the American Sugar Refining Co., and the study of its treatment not only of those with whom it has had business relations, but also its ungrateful conduct toward the Government of these United States without the protecting arm of whose laws this nefarious corporation could not have existed for a moment. Here was a corporation, the officers of which stood most high in the business world. Officers who were men who either by education or environment had had the greatest opportunity to represent and typify the highest and most enlightened business ideals in the great metropolis of our country; men who financially, socially, and mentally stood upon the topmost pinnacle of twentieth century business; and the consequence was that their position necessitated their following a course of rectitude possibly even more than the average man. Not that it is to be contended that any man, be he rich or poor, high or low, should not respect and obey the law. All men should obey the law of God and man alike; but I do contend without justifying the guilt of the one or the other, that he who has amassed a great fortune is far less excusable in violating the law for the sake of further financial gain, in the eyes of all right-thinking men, than was Jean Valjean when he stole a baker's loaf to keep starvation from those whom he loved.

What, then, must be the impression upon the minds of those of socialistic tendencies when they see men who need not one ducat more for their necessary or even their luxurious wants, and desire more for no other purpose save that of gratifying the insatiate maw of money-mad men, stoop to the lowest depths of avarice till in the broad daylight of our modern civilization they will even throw down the challenge of Danton as the gage to battle in such an unholy cause.

And yet the American Sugar Refining Co., whose history is an open book of violations of the law, must now be rewarded by getting their raw material duty free, and together with their associate refining companies they will bring same in from their extensive Cuban holdings without contributing one cent of duty for the support of the Government. Such is the merited hatred of the American people and their Representatives in Congress for this corporation that whenever you mention the "sugar schedule" their first idea is to make all sugar duty free as a mode of penalizing "the trust." But permit me to respectfully suggest to them that if they wish to penalize through the sugar schedule this trust, which so deeply merits punishment, that the mode of procedure would be to take the duty off their finished product, and not to give them their raw material duty free; but this method of punishment might also catch the Federal Sugar Refining Co., and incidentally "the secretary" of the "committee of wholesale grocers formed for the reduction of the duties on sugar," and as the said "secretary" has been the Moses who has so philanthropically organized himself into a benefactor of the American consumer, such action might appear ungrateful—to some persons.

My view of the way of punishing the Sugar Trust for their violations of the law is by prosecutions in the courts and by sending the guilty officials to a Federal prison, when they have been condemned by the verdict of 12 of their fellow men, and not by rewarding monopoly, as the committee does in this measure, however honest and commendable, though misguided, their intentions may have been.

So this delusive measure is the result in part of the just and righteous indignation of the Democratic Members of this House against the American Sugar Refining Co., who have been caught red-handed in the act of smuggling. And the method of punishment, strange to say, without our Democratic colleagues even being aware of it and totally innocent of all knowledge of the source, has been selected by the refiners themselves, through their agent, one Frank C. Lowrey, who, disguised in the character of a self-constituted committee of wholesale grocers, has by means not only of the well-known yellow slip and other devices aroused the consumers of the country to a pitch of bitter hatred of all domestic producers of sugar, but has also circularized every Member of this body until a majority thereof are sincerely believing that the giving of the refineries their raw material duty free will be the salvation of the ultimate consumers of the land.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, let me reiterate, most respectfully, that this measure is beyond a doubt the most indefensible tariff bill ever proposed by our party.

Totally oblivious of the action of all the most enlightened nations of the world in recognizing the revenue-producing powers of a duty on sugar, the great revenue committee of this House recommends this measure. Even free-trade England, the country which is ever held up as par excellence, the ideal of the free trader, has to-day, after years of experiments, been compelled to change its policy, in so far as this article of commerce is concerned, and place a duty for revenue thereon; and such is the revenue law of England to-day. And Lloyd-George and his able associates are not asking for its repeal. Both the income tax and the duty on sugar go hand in hand, even in England, and side by side on the statute book they stand, yielding between them the great bulk of the revenue so necessary to carry on the expenses of that nation, however honestly and economically administered may be her Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not yield any more. He yielded all the time to the gentleman, but I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to grant the gentleman more time, but I shall ask unanimous consent when we get back into the House that all gentlemen may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD. As the debate is limited, I felt that it would be unjust to take more than an hour's time, and I feel that it would be unjust——

Mr. MANN. But debate has not been limited as yet.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I feel that it would be unjust for anyone else to take more than an hour's time. Therefore I must object to any further extension of time in this way.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, how many minutes was the gentleman from Louisiana yielded?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three minutes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I simply wanted to know the exact time given the gentleman, and, having learned it, I suggest that inasmuch as this bill is to wipe out a great industry of his State it was peculiarly fitting that the number of minutes given him by the Democratic Party to speak at its demise was 23. [Laughter.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, to conclude my remarks, examine this measure from whatever angle you may it is found to be un-Democratic to the core.

The principles of Jefferson can never be twisted into such corkscrew proportions as to command us as his disciples of a later day and generation to write a schedule on our statute books which, becoming a law to-day, would say to those who have up to this hour been defended by a 50 per cent or 60 per cent duty shall to-morrow sell their product in the free-trade markets of the world while they continue to buy all they consume in the highly protected markets of America. It may be that in opposing this measure I may be considered by some as not so good a party man as others, but come what may, I shall never cast my vote nor lift my voice in favor of any measure which, in addition to being both discriminatory and unjust, is in direct contravention of the welfare of those whom I represent, as well as a measure which is totally repugnant to the solemn pledges made by me to my constituency prior to election.

I know it sounds well upon this floor to hear a Member of this body eulogize the ideal of legislating in the interest of 90,000,000 people instead of looking to the interests of the 190,000 in each of their respective districts. But however meritorious such ideal may be—and none can dispute its broad-mindedness—I for one shall never vote to sacrifice my own people who have reposed a confidence in me, under the plea of the benefits to be derived from this bill to all of the consumers of the Nation, when I know, or at least honestly believe, that instead of redounding to the ultimate benefit of the consumers of the land that the chief beneficiaries of this legislation would be the millionaire sugar refiners who to-day sit in their magnificent offices somewhere around 138 Front Street, New York City, and smilingly await this punishment which my Democratic brethren are meting out to them, much as the proverbial rabbit regarded the briar patch just before the little boy threw him in.

I reiterate, Mr. Chairman, my solemn and sincere opposition to this measure, and I now declare that I shall never accept as Democratic a measure, which says to my people who repose their confidence in me, "You must buy in a protected market all that you consume and you must sell in the free-trade markets, open to the world, all that you produce."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21213, to revise the sugar schedule, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent leave was granted—

To Mr. ALEXANDER to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Thomas Brewer, H. R. 6842, Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

To Mr. MORRISON, to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Milton F. Davenport, H. R. 6528, Fifty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 89. Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States.

THE SUGAR SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of gentlemen on both sides of the House, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken upon this bill may extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD, and that all other Members in the House may have five legislative days after the passage of the bill within which to print in reference to the subject matter of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why does the gentleman make the request at this time, when the House is still continuing in debate on the bill and gentlemen are still entitled to debate the bill in the committee, where it is far more important and educating to hear the speeches than it is to have them printed—to "can" them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I stated to the House that I made this request at the desire of gentlemen on both sides of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. At least until debate has been limited, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the House that if the House desires to do so, by unanimous consent—and I address my remarks to the leader of the minority—I shall ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess at this time until half past 7, and that from half past 7 until 11 o'clock to-night there shall be a session for debate only upon this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to state that I have been listening to speeches very carefully and attentively, and I hope beneficially, from both sides of this House for about six hours. While I shall not object to the request of the gentleman, if the House takes a recess until half past 7, when it reconvenes I shall insist upon the presence of a quorum of the House and the presence of a quorum of the committee during the continuance of the debate on a bill so important as this, at this time in the session, when we have plenty of time to really debate the subject for the real information of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's statement makes it apparent that we would spend most of the night getting a quorum. Therefore I shall not renew the request. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, March 15, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

[Telegram.]

SEATTLE, WASH., March 13, 1912.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Public Service Commission of the State of Washington is unalterably opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any steamship line owned, operated, or controlled directly or indirectly by a railroad engaged in interstate commerce. We trust every effort will be used to prevent it. If permitted, the canal will be useless in connection with transcontinental rates, and will in nowise benefit interstate commerce between States bordering on United States littoral.

GEORGE A. LEE, Chairman.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I gave notice the other day that immediately after the close of morning business to-day I should move that the Senate take up the general pension bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was merely waiting for the Senator to make the motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am giving my reason for asking that that bill be now taken up. There are two Senators who desire to speak on that subject to-day, as I am informed, and I also desire to complete my remarks. That being the case, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the service pension, which is House bill No. 1.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment, though I know it is not debatable?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator withholds his motion temporarily.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to express the hope that the business of the Senate may be so arranged that at an early day we shall get to the calendar under Rule VIII. It is getting to be rather voluminous; and while the bills are not extremely important, I think we ought to take them up for consideration before long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before proceeding with the comparison of the two bills that are before the Senate it may be profitable to glance for a moment at what the Congress has been doing during the last few years in the matter of extending the benefit of the pension legislation and increasing the amount of our appropriations.

The last general pension legislation prior to 1907 was passed June 27, 1890. That was the first service-pension legislation applicable to veterans of the Civil War. For 17 years following no particular change was made in our pension laws. On February 6, 1907, we enacted a law making age the standard for fixing the amount of pension. By that act we increased our annual pensions for the next five years in an amount, as I now remember, aggregating about $15,000,000 per year.

The very next year after that, in the year of 1908, on April 19, we amended the law of 1890 and placed at $12 per month the pension of every widow entitled to receive a pension under that law. Previously such pension was $8 per month. We added very materially also to the number of widows who could be placed upon that roll by repealing that section of the law which provided that in order to obtain its benefits the claimant must be able to show that she did not have an annual income of $250 per year.

The increase under that law, I think, was about $12,000,000 a year. If we again amend the pension laws in the year 1912 by the measure now proposed by the Committee on Pensions, we will be required to increase our pension appropriation bill on an average for the next five years by, say, $20,000,000 a year. So the Senate will see that the Government has not been remiss in its duty to the veterans, but has attempted to meet the disabilities incident to increasing years by very materially increased pensions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, right there I should like to ask the Senator if the bill as reported to the Senate by the Committee on Pensions should become a law, what would be the total amount of appropriation required?

Mr. McCUMBER. The present amount is about $152,000,000 a year, I believe, and the passage of the bill as reported by the committee would add an average of about $20,000,000 a year—$14,000,000 the first year and about $33,000,000 the second year.

Mr. OVERMAN. But an average for five years of about $20,000,000?

Mr. McCUMBER. The average for five years, after making the proper allowance for the death rate, would be about $20,000,000 a year.

Mr. OVERMAN. So that the total amount of pension appropriations would be, then, about $175,000,000?

Mr. McCUMBER. About that, in case the bill as reported by the Committee on Pensions should be enacted into law.

Further than this, by the act of February 6, 1907, as it applies to the survivors of the war, and again by the act of April 19, 1908, as it applies to the widows, we have made the pension roll a roll of honor only, and not the mere measurement of financial or physical distress; and it is my own firm opinion and unalterable conviction that there should be no reaction along that line. Under the law as it now stands we have eliminated all questions of financial condition, all questions of physical condition, and all questions as to whether present ailments of claimants resulted from service or otherwise. An application under the later laws needs no investigation along that line. The law tempts no one to expand his conscience beyond normal limits in order to come within its provisions; it causes the cheek of no claimant to redden when he makes his application to become a pensioner by compelling him to declare that he is in his dotage, that he is enfeebled, or that he is poverty stricken.

Mr. President, I think there has been considerable economy under the operation of these laws. By the two acts to which I have particularly referred we have eliminated the services of the physician and the financial examiner. By those acts industry and economy are no longer penalized. The soldier of the most extended hospital record to-day has no advantage in proving his claim over the soldier who has the most extended field record. What we have accomplished in that direction, Mr. President, we ought not to lose by any subsequent legislation.

Mr. President, two bills were before the Committee on Pensions. One bill would require an appropriation for the second year at least $86,500,000 over present appropriations. The bill as recommended by the committee will require at least $33,000,000 in additional appropriations the second year. The one will average, I believe, from $56,000,000 to $60,000,000 a year for the next five years, and the other will average about $20,000,000 a year for the next five years.

I can not help but feel that the pension bill which passed the House and came before the committee, known as House bill No. 1, received many votes through a misapprehension or a misunderstanding on the part of the several Members of the House who voted in its favor as to the total amount which it would be necessary to raise to meet the requirements of that bill. It may be that it would have passed the House if there had been no error in the report, but it is certainly true that the report upon which I have a right to assume the vote was based is most grossly erroneous. I am not saying, and would not for a moment intimate, that it was intentionally erroneous, but I am inclined to believe that the chairman of the House committee having the matter in charge must have turned over some of the computations to some other person who was not very accurate in his figures, and probably because of the great amount of labor imposed upon him he did not have the time carefully to analyze the statement before it was presented as the report of that committee. Ordinarily, Mr. President, I would say that whenever we desire to get an estimate of the additional cost involved in an increase of pensions it is far safer to go to the Bureau of Pensions and obtain from them a very careful estimate. I am not certain whether the committee who reported the House bill did that or not. I am certain, however, that if they did they must have abandoned the information which they received and proceeded to make their own calculations as to what the additional cost of House bill No. 1 would be.

We ought not to allow our enthusiasm to run away with our judgment in the matter of such computations. If we feel that we should appropriate $87,000,000 a year from to-day in order to meet pension demands, then we ought to admit the amount and proceed to raise the money either by the issuance of bonds or by some other method.

I wish to call attention now to the very first proposition that is made in the report in support of House bill No. 1 in relation to the amount required to pay for the additional pensions.

Senators will remember that under House bill No. 1, which is purely a service-pension bill, the soldier who served for 90 days receives a pension of $15 per month; if he served 6 months, he receives $20 per month; if he served 9 months, he receives $25 per month; if he served 1 year or over, he receives $30 per month.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIPPITT in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. The bill also provides that a soldier whose term of service was cut short by injuries received in the service shall get $30 a month without regard to how long he served.

Mr. McCUMBER. I presume the Senator refers to section 2, which reads as follows, in addition to the sums I have mentioned:

SEC. 2. That any person who * * * received an honorable discharge and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty, and is now unfit for manual labor through causes not due to his own vicious habits, or who, from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty resulting in his disability, is now unable to perform manual labor, shall be paid the maximum pension under this act, to wit, $30 per month, without regard to his length of service.

I assume that is what the Senator refers to.

Mr. BROWN. That section is left out of the bill which the Senator has reported.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; because those who received injuries in line of service and have become disabled are already provided for in the general law in accordance with the provisions relating to different disabilities, and if the soldier under the proposed law would receive less than he would under the law which grants pensions for specific disability he can apply under the latter.

Mr. BROWN. But the general law which gives him a pension without regard to the length of service does not fix a rate as high as $30 per month.

Mr. McCUMBER. Some pensions are not as high and some pensions are many times higher.

Mr. BROWN. I know there are some injuries, for instance, the loss of both legs or both hands, which constitute an exception, but generally under existing laws the pension does not reach as high a rate as $30 per month.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is correct in that.

Mr. BROWN. Does not the Senator think there is equity and justice in the proposition to give to the old soldier a pension of $30 a month when he was wounded in the service and received injuries in service, notwithstanding the fact that he received that injury before he served 90 days?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is unnecessary for the Senator to argue that question, because he knows I agree with him. I agree, and that is the general law, that although he may not have served more than one day, if he was actually injured in the service he should receive a pension. We have a general law relating to those who received injuries in service, and if the Senator wants to raise all those who were injured in the service, without regard to the character of the injury, to $30 per month, that would be entirely another proposition. The vast majority of those who are now drawing pensions are not receiving them because of any disability received in the line of service. A general pension law must necessarily be made for the benefit of the great majority, whether it is based upon age or service, or both. If the general law in any case does not grant as much as it ought to for a specific injury, we should increase the amount for that specific injury.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. Is the committee unanimously in favor of the bill before the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator from Illinois there is a majority report and there are also the views of the minority, the minority reporting what is known as the Sherwood bill, or House bill No. 1.

Now, the important question that has divided the members of the committee, and that which will undoubtedly divide the Senators in their opinions as to which bill should receive their support, is the question of the additional amount that will be required to be appropriated under either of these bills, and also the question which is the better standard as a basis for fixing the amount to be awarded in each case—the service standard or the age standard.

I have my own convictions upon that. My belief is and always has been that the pension given to soldiers of the Civil War other than those who received injury during the war is based upon the great national gratitude felt toward all those soldiers, and, as that gratitude is the basis of the grant, it should find its expression in a direction which will do the greatest amount of good. Our observation, as well as the experience of mankind, is that the length of service in the Civil War affects present physicial condition far less than advancing age; that the age is a far more important factor in the matter of disability than length of service. Therefore, if it is our purpose to reach by pension benefits those cases in which there is the greatest amount of disability, we will look to the question of age rather than the question of service.

If our gratitude is to be measured solely by length of service, without reference to the condition of the claimant, then we might as well base our pension legislation wholly upon length of service. But, as I stated in my report, that seems to me to smack too much of the idea of wage rather than the grant of pensions to meet what we all believe to be the growing disabilities of the soldier.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. I think there would be a great deal of force in the position the Senator takes if there was a very great disparity in the ages of these men, but it must be remembered that it is more than 50 years since the war began, and the average age, as I understand, of the soldiers on the pension rolls reaches about 70 years. When you get men above the 70-year mark they are all old men, and to measure the disability in years and consider it as a factor after they reach 70 is simply to deal in small fractions, in my judgment. It seems to me that the age as a test of disability disappears as we become more and more removed from the war times.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Nebraska is in error in his figures, but I understand the Senator from Utah has them.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there are 420,965 soldiers who would be affected by the present bill, and the ages of these soldiers are as follows: Between the ages of 62 and 66 there are 113,622, between the ages of 66 and 70 there are 128,414, between the ages of 70 and 75 there are 110,039, and of those 75 and over there are 68,890. So the Senator will observe that there are over one-half of the men under the 70-year age limit.

Mr. BROWN. That corroborates my estimate; approximately 70 years.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota whether the bill reported by the committee is the same as that known in common parlance as the Smoot substitute?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is one of the tables prepared by me, and I submitted some 18 of them, with different combinations of age and service. The one reported is known as No. 16.

Mr. KENYON. No. 16?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. The whole question of the cost of House bill No. 1 is determined by the number of soldiers who will receive the $30 benefit—that is, the number who served more than one year—and it is on this point that there seems to be the greatest diversity of opinion and the greatest amount of error in the record. I wish to call attention to the report on House bill No. 1. I will take just a brief portion from this particular provision:

"House bill 1 provides four classes—$15 per month, $20 per month, $25 per month, and $30 per month—rated on the length of service. The average rate is therefore $22.50 per month, or $270 per year. The average rate per man during the year ended July 1, 1911, was (official) $191.41. The increase under House bill 1 would therefore be $78.59. Apply this increase to 446,000 soldiers and the amount is, in round numbers, a little over $34,000,000. The Pension Bureau estimate on the cost of the disability section (section 2) of House bill 1 will add a trifle over $3,000,000, making the aggregate not far from $37,000,000."

Now, notice that it is asserted that the increase under the House bill would amount to $78.59 a year. If there are 446,000 soldiers, and this estimate is not one-half of what the annual increase to each soldier would be, the Senate can very quickly understand how enormous must be the error when you multiply more than $78.59 by 446,000. In other words, you have to multiply more than double this amount by 446,000 in order to get the correct figures.

Now, let us give the Senator a simple illustration of this method of computation. Suppose a dealer sells 10 barrels of apples at $5 per barrel, and 2 barrels at $1 per barrel. He will receive $50 for the first lot and $2 for the second, or $52 in all. But, according to the arithmetic in this report, as he received $5 per barrel for one lot and $1 per barrel for the other lot, by adding the $5 and $1 together, which would be $6, and dividing that by 2 you would get $3 as the average received, and multiplying the 12 barrels sold by this average, $3, and you have $36 instead of $52. That is pretty good arithmetic for the buyer, but rather tough on the seller.

It will be noticed here that in order to arrive at this $22.50 per month that each soldier would receive under the new bill—No. 1—we must take the several items, $15, $20, $25, and $30 per month and add them together and divide the sum by four, which would give us the $22.50 per month.

When we observe such an error as that we may well suppose that this bill passed the House through a misunderstanding as to the added appropriation which would be required.

I am further justified in the presumption that there must have been a misunderstanding, because not a single step has been taken by the other House to raise the necessary funds. No suggestion has been made that we will have to raise next year about $87,000,000 extra; that we will be compelled to add to our revenues and will have to adopt means for raising that additional revenue; but, on the contrary, the only bills that are coming over from the House dealing with the revenues reduce rather than increase them. So there is a fair presumption that this error influenced the vote very much upon that question.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, the Senator will concede that it is of very little vital interest what actuated the House in passing the bill. It throws very little light on our duty here. I do not like to see——

Mr. McCUMBER. I have stated that, and I simply desire to follow up what I have said and to bring out the fact that if we pass the bill for $87,000,000 we certainly must adopt some means of raising the revenue to pay it.

Mr. BROWN. That is very true, but I do not like to see a good measure, even though it passed the House through an error or misunderstanding, put on that ground.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, if we believe we ought to grant the bill as it passed the House, without reference to the amount, we should vote for it, and then should proceed to consider the ways and means to pay it. So the Senator is doing nothing further than repeating what I have already stated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was much interested a moment ago in the Senator's statement, and his seeming demonstration of it, that the figures which were used in arriving at a conclusion as to what would be the increase under the Sherwood bill were inaccurate. I have heard it asserted, and I want to ask the Senator whether it be true or not, that under the bill which you are reporting as a substitute you have your calculations put upon the basis of figures that were issued five years ago?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator probably has reference to the statement that it is based upon figures that were obtained 20 years ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I——

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not heard the other statement, that it is based upon anything obtained five years ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You reason from your figures, and by that I mean the tables here, which you claim——

Mr. McCUMBER. The table we have is brought right up to date. Every table I have seen is brought up to very near the date of reporting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked the Senator the question because, of course, the amount depends in your bill altogether upon the age classification under which the soldiers would fall.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; both age and length of service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But in substance it is age, because a man who served three years and a half under the 62-year class would receive less than a man who had served 90 days under the 70-year class. But the Senator says, as I understand him, that that is a mistake and that the tables upon which he bases his calculation were furnished by the Pension Office and were brought right up to date.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, sir; right up to date.

Mr. President, I want to see how much this error amounts to, because it is stated that the increase under the bill, exclusive of section 2 of House bill No. 1, will be $34,000,000. Making the computation upon the figures which are correct, I find that there is an error of $81.91 on each soldier's yearly income from the pensions under House bill No. 1. If we multiply that by 446,000, the number that is used in the report, we find that it will take $36,531,860 more than the $34,000,000. In other words, it would be over $70,000,000 a year instead of the $34,000,000 per year.

I do not wish to rest this entirely upon my own statement. I had the expert from the Bureau of Pensions, Mr. Thompson, go carefully over this report and give his testimony before the committee. He was subject to cross-examination. He answers this proposition in the House bill, which I have already given, as follows:

> Mr. THOMPSON. The average here is reached by adding together the four rates—$15, $20, $25, and $30—and dividing the total by 4. In that way you get $22.50. Multiplying that by 12 you get $270, the yearly average.

I might say the present yearly average is $191.41, and, subtracting that from the $270, gives the $79.59 which the report says will be the average increase.

> That would be the average rate of pension to which they would be entitled if those averages were correct—if there were as many at $15 as there were at $30. But, as I have said, our statistics show that 71 per cent would be entitled to $30, and, of course, that changes the general average, so many more being entitled to the larger rate. It makes the increase $160.50 instead of $78.59. The cost the first year is based on that average. If you issue 200,000 certificates during the first year, and the average increase is $160, you have $32,000,000. But if it is only $78, you have only a little over $15,000,000. The only question is, Who is right?

But, Mr. President, the 446,000 which is used as a multiplier is also inaccurate. It should be considerably larger. If the right number was adopted, it would make the figures so much greater in the result. The House report says:

> The number of deaths during the year ending July 1, 1911, was 35,243, or an average of almost 3,000 a month. The number of soldiers who will be available for pensions on the 1st day of January, 1912, is estimated to be about 509,000. Of this number over 63,000 are now drawing pensions of $25 per month and $30 per month and over.

I especially call attention to this statement of this number. Sixty-three thousand are now drawing pensions at $25 per month and $30 per month. Why those two sets of figures are combined I can scarcely understand, because in this the author is attempting to take a certain number of them without the operation of this bill, and, of course, those who are already receiving $30 a month and over would not be computed in determining the amount of increase. But many of those who are receiving $25 should be computed; and why he takes 25 and 30 together I certainly am unable to understand. But he is in error even upon those two.

Hence—

> in estimating the increased cost for pensions (should House bill 1 be enacted) we must deduct 63,000 from the entire number of pensioners, leaving the number of soldiers available for the increase on January 1, 1912, 446,000.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he knows how many soldiers are receiving the $25 rate?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have it right here. I have the two together here. I can get from the report those who are receiving the $25 rate. They are both given in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. BROWN. It is a very small number, is it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will give the total, and then the Senator can see. But if we were to deduct those receiving $25, we might as well deduct those receiving $22.50 and those receiving $20, and so on. I am simply speaking now as to the accuracy of the report.

Mr. BROWN. The $25 class should not be deducted. I think the Senator is right about that. What I wanted to show was that that is a very small class.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is enough to make quite a little difference in the multiplier. Dr. Thompson answers this as follows:

> On page 5 of this report it is stated that 63,000 survivors of the Civil War are now drawing pensions of $25 and $30 per month and over. The number of Civil War survivors on the roll June 30, 1911, who were receiving $25 per month and over was less than 30,000. The only pensioners on the roll who can properly be excluded from consideration in making estimates on this bill are those receiving $30 per month and over—the maximum rate fixed by this bill. On June 30, 1911, there were 26,172 survivors on the roll at $30 per month and over.

It makes quite a little difference, then, whether you deduct $26,173 from your multiplier or whether you deduct 63,000 from it. So while it may not be great compared with the whole, still it makes several million dollars difference.

Again, Mr. President, it is claimed that under House bill No. 1 there will be considerable saving in the expenses paid out for special examiners. I have tried to ascertain what that saving is based on, and I confess I can not see that there will be anything saved; but, on the contrary, it is quite certain that under this bill there will be an increase.

The vast majority of the soldiers, as I have stated, I think about 357,000, are now drawing their pensions under the act of February 6, 1907, and under that act age alone is made the basis of the amount received. It takes no special examiner, ordinarily at least, to ascertain the age of the claimant. It requires no more a special examiner under the present law to ascertain the age than it would, except in a very few cases, to ascertain the length of his service, because where he has enlisted several times, even in obtaining the length of service you have to go over all the records and ascertain how long he served under each one of those enlistments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Therefore, under the present law we are not using the special examiners for the purpose of assisting us in granting pensions to those 357,000, and we will not be using them in the future, of course, in granting the pensions to the same number upon the basis of service. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, I think, has answered the very question I was going to propound. The age of these soldiers was determined when they received the increase——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the law the Senator cites?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; under the law of 1907.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, it is a mere matter of addition as to the present age. The bureau will do that, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, what is the duty performed by these special examiners? Generally, we are now paying out about $700,000 a year altogether for the special examiners, and so forth. They are making examinations of the widows' cases; they are making their examinations of cases under the regular establishment and in the Spanish War cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. And in cases of alleged fraud, I will say.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and in cases of alleged fraud, as the Senator has stated.

In the case of the widows it is often quite difficult to ascertain whether the first husband is dead, where there has been a second marriage to a soldier; so also where the soldier has been twice married; so also in cases of divorce, whether or not the divorce was actually obtained as claimed, in order to establish the marital status of the parties. For that we require quite an army of examiners.

Now, here is what the report on House bill No. 1 says on that, and this is not the only error:

> Here is another very valuable consideration: Last year the Government paid out over $700,000 for medical boards and special examiners. Under House bill 1 nearly all these boards can be abolished without detriment to the service, as under House bill 1 there will be no occasion for a medical examination, as every soldier will paid on his service, with the exception of only one section of the bill.

Under the present law they are all paid according to their age. Under House bill No. 1 they will be paid according to their service. There will be no greater expense in the one than in the other and, therefore, there will be no saving.

> We also paid out last year over $300,000 for special pension examiners, making in all considerably over $1,000,000.

Mr. President, that is an error again. The $300,000 is a part of the $700,000, and it seems by some way to have been added to it in order to make the million dollars.

Mr. CURTIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will just finish the reading, then I will yield—

> Nearly all of which can be saved and the money paid direct to the soldiers, because there will be no necessity whatever for examining boards, as the exact status of every soldier is fixed by this law; it is fixed on his service and can not be either raised or reduced by the action of any medical board or special pension examiners.

That is true, but that applies also to those who are obtaining their pensions under the present law.

> This is an important feature, as a million dollars now spent on useless boards can be paid direct to the old soldiers.

I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator said a moment ago that the amount expended for special examiners was $700,000, as I remember it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. The report of the commissioner shows that there was expended only $283,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not for all of the service referred to. I include the medical boards.

Mr. BROWN. And the detective force.

Mr. McCUMBER. Those are special examiners; they are all detectives. Now, let us take the reply that is given by the expert from the Bureau of Pensions, Mr. Thompson. He says:

> Referring again to the report accompanying House bill No. 1, attention is invited to the statement on page 3, that the Government last year paid out over $700,000 for medical boards and special examiners; that under this bill all these boards can be abolished; that there will be no occasion for a medical examination; and, further, that there was also paid out last year over $300,000 for special pension examiners, making in all considerably over $1,000,000—all of which can be saved and the money paid direct to the soldiers. As I have previously stated, a medical examination will be required in each claim filed under section 2 of this bill wherein it is alleged that the claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor, before the claim can be allowed. Under this section, as before stated, there will be an increase in the cost of medical examinations of $200,000 per annum if this bill should become a law.

Note that, instead of decreasing, according to the estimate there will be an increase of $200,000 a year, to comply with section 2 of House bill No. 1.

> You will observe that it is stated that $700,000 was paid for medical boards and special examiners, and later that over $300,000 was paid last year for special pension examiners, making in all considerably over $1,000,000. The cost of the special examiners was included in the $700,000 item, and then again added to the $700,000 to make up the $1,000,000. One question which now arises in invalid claims which requires the aid of the special examiners is that of the identity of the claimant with the soldier. This question is absolutely necessary to determine, under any bill, before a claim is allowed. Special examiners are largely engaged upon the investigation of claims arising on account of service during the Spanish War and on account of service in the Regular Army and Navy since the close of the Civil War. It is also necessary to determine the merits of a large number of claims filed by Civil War widows. Many widows are unable to secure satisfactory evidence showing either their marriage to the soldier or the death of the soldier's former wife or of their own former husband. Special examiners are also engaged in the work of investigating charges which may be filed against pensioners, from various sources, in order to determine whether the pensioner is legally entitled to the pension received. It will thus be seen that the enactment of House bill No. 1 would have no effect whatever upon the number of special examiners engaged in field work.

This is a very considerable error; and I am calling attention to these errors, so that the Senate in voting for either one of these bills may have at least accurate data upon which they can base their judgment.

Again, it is stated:

> The report of the Commissioner of Pensions for 1911 shows, on page 14, that since the act of February 6, 1907—that is, the age-pension law—629,605 applications for pensions have been filed in the Pension Office under that law.

Of course, you can naturally see that would carry the idea that many different soldiers had filed applications under the 1907 act, when as a matter of fact there are not so many survivors living.

> And during the last year 55,167 certificates for new pensions were issued by the Pension Bureau under this age-pension law.

There is an error again, if we understand by the words "new pensions" that they are "original" pensions, and taking the whole clause, I assume that is what was intended.

Again, he says:

> How many of these 629,605 applicants for increased pensions under this law were long and short term soldiers is not stated; but it is a fair conclusion that most of these claimants were short-term soldiers.

Well, Mr. President, was it a fair conclusion that they were "short-term soldiers"? Why should it be supposed that they were short-term any more than long-term soldiers? As soon as we passed the law of 1890 those who had served 90 days and who desired to obtain a pension were just as ready to make applications then as those who to-day are for the first time making their applications. An actual test and examination show that there is no reason for the supposition that they were short-service men. Some of these 629,605 applications will be found to be duplicates; a soldier will often make his application and then, thinking he had not made it correctly, will send in another application. There will be thousands and thousands of them who will make them over again.

Each application, of course, will be numbered, and there may be serial numbers running up to the figures quoted, but a third or half may be duplicates. As a matter of fact, only 356,830 are upon the pension roll to-day under that act.

In explanation of this change, Mr. Thompson says:

> It has been said that the short-service men came in under the act of February, 1907, after the age-pension law was passed. What are the facts? Only 21,771 original claims under that act have been allowed since it was passed.

So that there are not 55,167 new cases—that is, new in the sense of being original in the last year—but in all of the five years which have elapsed there have been only 21,771 original applications for pension under this particular law. I assume, Mr. President, that most of these are soldiers who during all of the previous period have felt that their condition was not such that it would justify them in demanding a pension; but as their physical disabilities increased with age it is but natural that they should now have applied as original claimants.

Now, I wish to answer very briefly the question asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who inquired if this data were not compiled from estimates that were made several years ago. Well, Mr. President, so far as they relate to the length of service of the veterans the data were taken from estimates of some 20 years ago, but as everyone, of course, will comprehend, the moment he gives the subject any consideration, the length of service of soldiers of the Civil War does not increase with years, but is an unchangeable fact. Out of a given number of soldiers now drawing pensions there would be no change in their average length of service; and while it is possible that those of longer service might die more rapidly than those of shorter service and thereby decrease to some limited extent the number who served more than one year, the chances are that there is no material change whatever. A very careful investigation, as careful as can be made without taking several months in going over the rolls and getting the service of every individual soldier, shows that the rate is about the same, and that is that about 71 per cent of the soldiers now upon the pensions rolls would, under House bill No. 1 as passed by that body, be entitled to $30 per month. If that is true, as can be established beyond any question whatever, the estimate of cost made by whoever reported House bill No. 1 will have to be increased.

It might be well right here, Mr. President, to suggest the method adopted to arrive at the length of service of each soldier. I thought I had the method here in detail, but I can state it generally. In 1890, after the passage of the act of June 27, 1890, Gen. Raum, then Commissioner of Pensions, adopted a card-index plan covering every case in which an application was made. He had cards filed in more than 475,000 cases. The cards gave the age of the soldier, the length of service, and other data which were necessary at that time. From those cards he obtained the figures that more than 71 per cent of the soldiers served more than one year. Since that time several estimates have been made. A short time ago some 12,000 names of soldiers were drawn at random, and it was found that of those 12,000 the number of those who had served a year or more averaged 71.5 per cent.

Again, since we have been discussing this subject some 5,400 additional claims have been adjudicated, and of those 5,400 claims it has been found that about 72 per cent served more than one year. So I think we can safely rely on the estimate that 71 per cent of the total number of the survivors of the Civil War will, under House bill No. 1, be entitled to receive a pension of $30 per month.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator what would the same class of pensioners receive under the bill which his committee has reported?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the estimate is in the neighborhood of from $18 to $20 per month. They will receive different amounts.

Dr. Thompson, again referring to this matter, says:

Within the last two days—

And this testimony was given a short time ago—

Within the last two days I have found some statistics relating to the Civil War soldiers who were pensioned under the general law. While there were only 12,000, I have had their length of service tabulated, and what does it show? It bears out the length of service of these 475,000 men. That is, 70.7 per cent of those pensioned under the general law served one year and more; 12.6 per cent served nine months and less than a year; 7.7 per cent served six months and less than nine; and 8.1 per cent served three months and less than six months.

Mr. President, before closing my remarks upon this subject, I wish to state some reasons why the committee adopted the double standard. Ever since the act of June 27, 1890, at every encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, the question of the standard which should govern the granting of pensions has been considered, and in every instance, with the exception of one, I believe, the representatives of the soldier element of the country have unfalteringly stood by the standard of age rather than the standard of service. In the last encampment, that of 1911, the question came up again because of the bill which had been introduced in the House. After listening to an argument by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions in the House, the committee again took that subject under consideration, and after very considerable debate they adhered practically to their old standard. They were perfectly willing, of course, to take the extra amount that would be carried by the House bill, but they recommended that the Representative in charge of that bill should so modify it that it would more nearly conform to what was known as the Sulloway bill. The Sulloway bill was an age bill pure and simple, and, of course, it is an impossibility to conform age and length of service so they will more nearly equal each other. All that we could possibly do would be to adopt both of those standards. Thereafter I attempted to arrive at the sentiment of the members of the Grand Army of the Republic, or at least the officers of that body, as to their preference if we were compelled to decide finally between a pension which should be based only upon length of service and one based wholly upon age. From everyone I received the same reply, that the members of the Grand Army of the Republic preferred the age standard rather than the length-of-service standard, but they desired that we should adopt a double standard.

Mr. President, without taking any time to read them, I will ask to have inserted in my remarks the resolution adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic at its last encampment; also the statement of Mr. Torrance, who is past commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic; the statement of Mr. Washington Gardner, who is a member of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; the statement of Mr. Henry S. Redman, also a member; the statement of Mr. Samuel S. Burdette, also a member; and a rather late report which I have from Mr. Redman where he has submitted the question to his particular post. I think I will read what he states:

MYRON ADAMS POST, NO. 84,
DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC, Rochester, N. Y., February 19, 1912.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Have read proposition No. 16, which was adopted by your honorable committee a few days ago. I am pleased to say that it has met with favorable indorsement by a large majority of the comrades in this part of the State.

While not as liberal as they expected, they will be satisfied at this time. Speaking for myself, as one of the Grand Army of the Republic pension committee, I fully indorse No. 16, and most earnestly hope it will become a law and will meet with the approval of a majority of the people and the veterans of the Civil War. Will you please send me two or three copies of the bill, and oblige?

Sincerely, yours,
H. S. REDMAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Without objection, it is ordered that the other documents be printed in the RECORD as a part of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota.

The matters referred to are as follows:

The only action on the subject of pensions taken by the forty-fifth national encampment, which was held at Rochester last August, was embodied in the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this Forty-fifth National Encampment of the Grand Army that the time has come to-day, 50 years after the outbreak of the great Civil War, to deal generously with the survivors of that war; and we unite in asking our comrade, Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, chairman of the Pensions Committee of the House of Representatives, to so modify his House bill No. 1 as to make it more nearly conform in general features to the Sulloway bill, which passed the House at the last regular session by an immense majority, which was indorsed by the legislatures of 27 States of the Union, and which is understood and approved by a majority of our comrades. And we further urge early action by Congress, as our comrades are dying at the rate of 50,000 per year."

STATEMENT OF MR. ELL TORRANCE, OF MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., PAST COMMANDER IN CHIEF OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC AND CHAIRMAN OF THE NATIONAL PENSION COMMITTEE OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. ELL TORRANCE. I am past commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic and chairman of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic.

This committee is the only body authorized to officially represent and speak for the Grand Army of the Republic on the subject of pensions.

Early in December last the committee met in this city, all members being present, with the exception of Comrade Kelly, of Emporia, Kans. In addition to the members of the committee, the present commander in chief, Harvey M. Trimble, of Princeton, Ill., was present. We conferred upon the subject of pensions, went over the matter thoroughly, and adopted the following resolution, which expresses the sense of the committee upon what we regarded as an important matter relating to this subject:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that the age and service standards should be combined in any pension measure enacted by the present Congress, to the end that justice and equity be done to all classes of our comrades."

That was agreed upon by the six members present and approved by the commander in chief.

STATEMENT OF MR. WASHINGTON GARDNER, PAST DEPARTMENT COMMANDER OF THE DEPARTMENT OF MICHIGAN, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Now, as to the two bills: I speak the unanimous voice of our committee when I say that we are heartily in accord with the principles of the McCumber or Senate bill in regard to the joint standard—age and service.

STATEMENT OF MR. HENRY S. REDMAN, COMMANDER OF POST 84, DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. REDMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am from the great State of New York. Since the 1st of January, practically speaking, I have done nothing but talk about pensions. I have visited some 12 posts in the western part of the State, installing the officers in 10 of them, and in each case I have taken from 30 to 45 minutes to talk upon the question of pensions, explaining to them the difference in the different bills and then getting their expression after the meetings.

I find that 95 per cent of the veterans in western New York to whom I have talked—I assume 5,000 or 6,000 altogether—are unanimous in favor of a double-standard bill. They will be perfectly satisfied with such a bill.

I had a copy of proposition No. 11 with me at nearly every meeting. Last Friday night I was in Buffalo, where I addressed the largest post in the world, with something over 700 members. Over 400 of them were present. I had there a copy of the McCumber Senate bill. I read it and talked upon the bill for 30 minutes. I failed to find one comrade in that gathering that was not absolutely satisfied with a bill of that character.

STATEMENT OF MR. SAMUEL S. BURDETTE, PAST COMMANDER IN CHIEF OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

If I should say anything at all, it would only be to add my voice in urging the sort of bill that has been prepared in this committee—you may call it, if you please, the McCumber bill or the committee bill—that groups age and service.

I believe that the principle and method of the bill Senator McCUMBER has introduced will appeal, and does appeal, most heartily and thoroughly to the whole body of the surviving comrades of the Civil War.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will defer any further explanation of this bill at present, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has given notice of his desire to speak on the subject.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Has the Senator estimated in any way how many soldiers now living ever would receive the maximum of $30 per month under this bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. They could not, any of them, unless they lived to be 75 years of age.

Mr. KENYON. Have you estimated with the aid of tables of mortality?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Kenyon	Poindexter
Bourne	Curtis	Kern	Pomerene
Brandegee	Dillingham	Lea	Rayner
Bristow	du Pont	Lippitt	Richardson
Brown	Fletcher	McCumber	Root
Bryan	Foster	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Burnham	Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Burton	Gardner	Nelson	Smoot
Chilton	Gore	Oliver	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Overman	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Hitchcock	Page	Watson
Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Percy	Williams
Culberson	Jones	Perkins	Works

Mr. NELSON. My colleague [Mr. CLAPP] is unavoidably absent on a committee hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have always favored and I will always favor just, liberal, nay, generous pensions to the old soldiers who went to their country's aid in time of sore distress, and who have been disabled by wound or accident or disease, or who, by other misfortune, may not be possessed of the comforts of life. I favor extending the country's bounty to their widows and to their dependent children. The old soldiers and their loved ones have always appealed to my heart—they always will.

This country is now more liberal in the bestowal of pensions upon its defenders than it ever was before in its history, and it is more generous than any nation on the face of the globe. I would not have it otherwise. It pays more pensions to its soldiers than the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, France, and Austria-Hungary combined. I want the Government to go into this matter just as far as the finances of the country or the merits of the situation will permit or require. No soldier who is in want can appeal to me while I occupy a legislative position in vain. But I am not in sympathy with the thought that the soldiers who are in good health or who have a competency should receive the same compensation as those who are wounded or diseased or in want of the common comforts of life. I do not believe that when the Government pays $30 to the old soldier "who hath not where to lay his head," that it should at the same time give the same amount to his comrade who may be sound in body and in health and have all the reasonable comforts of life. Especially is this my position when I remember that the money is contributed largely by the laboring and struggling masses of our country.

There is not a dollar paid out for pensions which does not represent a dollar of taxes which some man must pay, and the great portion of the taxes of this country is paid by those who can illy afford to do so.

Much has been said of late about the "dollar-a-day pension." There is more magic in the words than there is merit in this bill, when we come to consider the amount we are already paying, the state of the revenues of the Government, and the injustices which the bill itself perpetrates as among the soldiers themselves.

If, in the discussion of the pension question, I may seem to inject into it some things of a personal nature, I hope that my colleagues in the Senate, and my constituents in Ohio, will attribute it to a desire to set myself right where my position has been misrepresented by a seemingly studied effort.

I desire to call attention to the history of this bill.

HISTORY OF THE SHERWOOD BILL.

During the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, on December 3, 1907, Gen. SHERWOOD introduced H. R. 7625, to authorize "the creation of the volunteer service roll."

It is commonly known as the dollar-a-day pension bill. It provided that the volunteer soldier of the Civil War should be entered upon the "volunteer service roll," provided he had served with credit as an enlisted man not less than 18 months in the field with the troops between July 15, 1861, and July 15, 1865. If he served for 18 months, or if he was wounded in line of duty and so disabled as not to be able to serve the 18 months, he would be entitled to a pension of $1 per day during his natural life, from the date of his application for pension under the act.

On January 29, 1908, Gen. SHERWOOD made a speech (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 42, pt. 2, p. 1289) on the bill, and gave this estimate of the cost to the Government. He said:

I have been consulting the experts of the Pension Office, and so near as I can ascertain it will take the first year about $17,500,000. The amount will be reduced every year by 15 per cent; and the experts in the Pension Office say that by the end of nine years there will be practically no appropriation called for, because the veterans who will be benefited by this bill are the older class of soldiers and will practically all be dead in nine years. It is estimated in the Pension Office that about 175,000 soldiers will be included under the provisions of this bill. The estimates of the Pension Office differ as to the average amount the veterans are receiving now. It varies from $17.50 a month to $20 per month. I have estimated it at $20, and from this estimate it will take $17,500,000 the first year.

Again, on February 26, 1908, Gen. SHERWOOD spoke upon this bill (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 42, pt. 3, p. 2550), and, among other things, said:

This pension bill will only take about $17,500,000 the first year and 15 per cent less every year for nine years, when the veterans who belong to the older class of soldiers will practically all be gone.

On December 14, 1909, in the Sixty-first Congress, second session, Gen. SHERWOOD introduced his second bill, H. R. 5439, entitled "A bill for the enactment of a veteran volunteer roll." In substance this bill provided that every surviving volunteer of the Civil War should be entered upon the roll who served with credit not less than one year with troops in said Volunteer Army between April 20, 1861, and July 15, 1866. It also provided that if wounded in line of duty and thereby disabled from serving one year, or was discharged for disability contracted in the service, or was enlisted for one year or more, or was mustered out because of the close of the war, or if captured in battle or in the line of duty and served in a Confederate prison, his name should be entered upon this roll, and all such soldiers would receive $1 per day from the date of his application during his natural life.

On February 26, 1910, at the second session of the Sixty-first Congress he introduced his third bill, H. R. 21902, entitled "A bill to pension certain disabled veterans of the Civil War." In substance it provided that each volunteer officer and soldier in the Volunteer Army of the Civil War who served with credit not less than 90 days between April 20, 1861, and July 15, 1865, whose physical or mental condition was such as to require frequent and periodical aid and attention of another person, should be paid $30 per month during such disability.

On March 22, 1910 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 45, pt. 4, p. 3584), he again discussed the cost to the Government of these several bills, and said:

I simply desire to state what my original bill—$1-a-day bill—provided for, how much it would have taken out of the Treasury in 1908, when first introduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Senator from Ohio will suspend for a moment. The rules of the Senate prohibit a Senator from referring to what was said in the other House by a Member of that body when the point has been made. The Chair thinks it is only proper to call the Senator's attention to the fact.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no desire to trespass upon the rules, and I did not think I was doing so. This matter is somewhat of a personal privilege with me, and the statements made here go to the question of the cost of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I should like to have the rule read and see if it applies so that it prohibits a Senator from quoting what appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. NELSON. I think a Senator is entitled to quote what appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I do not think that violates the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Secretary to read the order of procedure from Jefferson's Manual and also the Precedents.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Chair state the number?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Chair has just directed the Secretary to read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What I was inquiring was the number of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the rule.

The Secretary read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

1. In order to refer to proceedings in.

Jefferson's Manual, section XVII, order in debate, page 96, we have—

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there, because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other, and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

Mr. ROOT and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read further.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEBRUARY 28, 1883.

The President pro tempore (Mr. David Davis) decided that it was not in order to refer to any action had in the House of Representatives upon any question not officially communicated to the Senate, and the Senate refused to lay an appeal on the table—yeas 24, nays 26.

The question of order was withdrawn. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 3368, 3369, 3371.)

2. Not in order to refer to proceedings of the other House.

APRIL 25, 1894.

Mr. Dolph, while addressing the Senate, proceeded to read an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives upon the pending bill. Mr. Gray raised a question of order that it was not in order to quote and comment upon a speech made during the same Congress by a Member of the other House upon the same bill. The Vice President (Mr. Stevenson) sustained the point of order, and decided that it was out of order in debate to notice what had been said on the same subject in the other House upon the bill.

An appeal from the decision was laid on the table—yeas 43, nays 2. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 4081–4082.)

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. ROOT. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not hear the Secretary state the paragraph or page from which he was reading, and I should like to know it.

Mr. ROOT. He first read from page 96 of Jefferson's Manual.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think it is the fault both of the clerk and Senators on the floor. None of them speak loud enough to be heard. I heard neither the clerk nor the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was simply inquiring as to the number of the page and paragraph which was read.

The SECRETARY. Page 366, "Precedents—Decisions on points of order in the United States Senate—1789–1909, Gilfry."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to state that he simply made the announcement because reference was made to what was said in the other House. No point has been made on it, and there is no use to take up the time of the Senate unless some Senator makes the point.

Mr. CULBERSON. Do I understand that the Chair holds it not to be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair made no ruling. The Chair was simply calling attention to the rule, because reference was being made as to what had been said or done in the other House. The Chair announced that no point had been made, but he thought it only fair to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the rule. There has been no intimation on the part of the Chair that the Senator was without the rule, but as the Senator was referring to what had occurred in the House he thought it only proper that the rule be read; that is all.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that the Senator from Ohio was not addressing himself to anything that was said upon the bill which is now under consideration, but he was giving an interesting historical review of what had happened upon previous bills, and surely we can revert to the parliamentary history of our country so far as the other House has taken part in it. If we can not go back to 1910 we can not go back to 1810, and we would be cut off entirely from the parliamentary history of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as I stated before, I feel that I would be the last man or one of the last men in this body to trespass upon the rules of the Senate. I think I understand what decorum in debate ought to be. But there is a question before the country now as to what pension legislation we shall have, what we ought to have, what the cost of this legislation is going to be. There has been a contention in behalf of House bill No. 1 that it would cost a given amount, and a given amount only, on the one side. It is contended on the other side that it would cost a given other amount. Now, may I not be permitted to show what these several contentions are and what the reasons for those contentions are and the conclusions to which each side of the controversy arrive? It was with that end in mind that I was quoting from these speeches to show what it was believed the estimated cost of the several bills would be.

In speaking further upon this subject, Gen. SHERWOOD said:

Also what my second bill, the dollar-a-day bill of 1909, which included soldiers who served one year, provided for.

Also what my last bill of February 26, 1910, which is really not my bill, provides for.

The last bill includes an amendment offered by a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRADLEY], who is also on the Military Committee. I simply introduced it on the suggestion that, owing to the condition of the Treasury, it was not thought possible to pass the dollar-a-day bill during this session for all veterans who served one year. It is estimated that it would take the first year out of the Treasury about $22,500,000, with a decrease every succeeding year of 15 per cent for seven years, when all old veterans would have passed from earth.

The last bill only applies to about 20,000 soldiers, and I have the authority of the Pension Office, confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ballinger, that that bill would take about $3,600,000 out of the Treasury the first year, and this amount would decrease every year 15 per cent for seven years, when all of the totally disabled soldiers who are taken care of by this legislation would be dead.

Ohio played her part during the great Civil War, and played it well. Her men and her women, inspired by patriotic love of the flag, made great sacrifices. It is the desire of her people, irrespective of party, that those soldiers and their widows, who sacrificed and suffered during the war, or are decrepit, diseased, or lacking in the comforts of life, as well as their minor children, shall be the objects of governmental care, and her people favor giving them liberal pensions.

In recognition of this sentiment the Democratic State convention at Dayton, Ohio, in June, 1910, declared in its platform:

We favor the immediate enactment of the dollar-a-day pension bill, introduced and championed in both the Sixtieth and Sixty-first Congresses by that Democratic veteran, Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, of Ohio.

Only one inference can be drawn from the language just quoted, namely, that it was regarded to be one and the same bill, and it would naturally follow that the expense would be one and the same, making due allowance for decreases due to death.

I had the honor to be named as the candidate of the Democratic Party for lieutenant governor upon that platform. It pledged the party in favor of the dollar-a-day pension bill, which would cost the Government from $17,500,000 to $22,500,000. Would that justify my voting for a new and a different bill, which was drawn and introduced into Congress more than nine months later, because it bears the same name, and which the Pension Bureau says will cost, and which I believe will cost, $75,000,000 yearly in addition to the $150,000,000 and more now required for the pension roll?

Personally I do not believe that any pension measure which embodies the principle of age alone or of service alone will work out equitably. My judgment is that a combination of the two elements ought to be taken into consideration. But while this is my personal opinion, in view of the action of the Ohio Democratic State convention and of the representations which were made as to the cost of the measure—if we call it one and the same—I would vote for it if such a measure were now before the Senate and the appropriation required did not materially exceed the amount represented.

On April 4, 1911, at the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, more than nine months after the Dayton convention, Gen. SHERWOOD introduced his fourth bill, H. R. 1, entitled "A bill granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War." It provided that any person who served in the military or naval service during the Civil War and who was honorably discharged should receive a pension as follows:

For 90 days' service or more, and less than 6 months, $15 per month.

For service of 6 months or more, and less than 9 months, $20 per month.

For service of 9 months or more, and less than 1 year, $25 per month; and

For a service of 1 year or more, $30 per month.

And every soldier who was wounded in battle or on duty, and thereby disabled, or who suffered from disease in line of duty, was to be given $30 per month pension, irrespective of his length of service, provided that no one who was receiving $25 per month or more under the act should be entitled to admission to any national soldier's home, and no State home should receive any governmental aid on account of any person who was in receipt of a pension of $25 a month or more.

The second section of the bill provided that any soldier of the Civil War wounded in battle or on duty and who was thereby unfit for manual labor, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty, resulting in disability, is unable to perform manual labor, should be paid $30 per month without regard to the length of service.

Section 3 provided that no one should be entitled to a pension under the act who was in receipt of an annual income of $1,000 or more.

ESTIMATE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

On April 11, 1911, when the Sherwood bill, No. 1, was pending, the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a letter of inquiry from Gen. SHERWOOD, advised him that under his bill the actual increase in the annual value of the pension roll, based on the number of pensioners on the roll June 30, 1910, would be $75,671,880, but he did not make any deductions for those who might be inmates of the national homes, and as there was no data available showing the number of survivors of the Civil War who had incomes of $1,000 or over, no deduction was made because of this exception in the bill. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, 62d Cong., 2d sess., p. 146.)

In August, 1911, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions made a report on the cost of H. R. 1. In this report he did not give the estimated cost of the bill furnished by the Secretary of the Interior, but referred to the report, and said with respect to it, on page 5:

> The chairman of the committee asked the Pension Bureau for the estimated cost of House bill 1, but owing to the section which excludes soldiers with a net income per year of $1,000 or over from the benefits of this act, the Pension Bureau refused to make any estimate of the aggregate cost of the bill. This refusal was based on the ground that the bureau has no data upon which to make such estimate. After a poll of some 20 Grand Army of the Republic posts the estimate runs from 20 to 30 per cent.

Apparently this means that from 20 per cent to 30 per cent of the members of those posts have an annual income of $1,000 or more. The chairman of the committee then proceeds to make an estimate of the cost of the bill, and by his method reaches the conclusion that the aggregate cost would be $28,858,000, and that because the Pension Bureau could only handle 200,000 cases the first year, it would take from the Treasury during that year only $15,718,000. But a careful reading of the methods of computation will fairly demonstrate that it is wholly unreliable.

To illustrate: He calls attention to the fact that the House bill provides for four classes of pensions—$15 per month, $20 per month, $25 per month, and $30 per month, rated on the length of service. He then strikes the average as being $22.50 per month, or $270 per year, and multiplies this by the number of soldiers estimated by him to be in the service, and arrives at a total of a little over $34,000,000, to which he adds $3,000,000 as being the cost of the disability section of the bill, and then deducts 22 per cent (what this is I do not know, unless it be that it is an attempt to deduct the proportion of those who have incomes exceeding $1,000), and arrives at his net estimate of $28,858,000. It is quite apparent that it is unfair to say that the average rate per month is $22.50, unless it should also appear that the number of soldiers in each of the four classes was the same. Or, to make it still plainer, if there were two of each class, then the average would be right; but if there were two in each of the first three classes and six in the last class, then the average would be wrong.

And this error is clearly indicated on page 6 of the report, when it says:

> There are, however, more surviving soldiers who served more than one year than for a less period.

It is said that a poll of 20 Grand Army posts was made, and from these it is "estimated that from 20 to 30 per cent" of the members receive a net income of $1,000 and over per year. While the Secretary of the Interior made the total cost of the bill $75,671,880 and made no deduction for those who had an income of $1,000 per year and over, if the estimate of 20 to 30 per cent as the proportion of the soldiers who have an income of $1,000 per year and over is correct, it would have been an easy matter to deduct from the total given by the Secretary of the Interior this 20 or 30 per cent and thereby arrive at the actual cost to the Government of the bill as it was originally introduced.

The information contained in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior as to the cost of the Sherwood bill was not disclosed to the House of Representatives until it was read by Hon. LYNDEN EVANS, a Member of the House from Illinois, on December 9, 1911, nearly eight months after the letter was written.

On December 13, 1911, H. R. 1, introduced April 4, 1911, was passed by the House after it had been amended to give a $30-per-month pension to all who served in the Mexican War; to strike out that part of the bill which provided that no one in receipt of a pension of $25 per month, or more, should be entitled to admission or residence in a national soldiers' home; to strike out that part of the bill which provided that no State or Territorial home should receive Government aid for those soldiers who were in receipt of $25 or more per month; and to strike out section 3 of the bill, which excluded from its provisions those who had an income of $1,000 per year or more.

The bill, therefore, as it passed the House, contained all of those provisions which were the basis of the estimate of the Secretary of the Interior, struck out all the elements which were not included in the estimate, and added thereto the increase of pensions to be paid to the soldiers of the Mexican War, and to that extent increased the total cost above the Secretary's figures.

CRITICISMS OF THE ESTIMATE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

On January 8, 1912, after House bill No. 1 had passed the House and reports were sent out to the effect that it was estimated by the Pension Bureau that the bill would add $75,000,000 to the pension roll the author of the bill made a speech in the House severely criticizing this estimate. It was made on April 11, 1911. It showed the annual increase to which the pensioners on the roll on January 30, 1910, would be entitled if the bill should become a law.

In the speech to which I have referred, it was said that 52,000 soldiers had died between the date upon which the Bureau of Pensions based its estimate and January 8, 1912, and that, therefore, the report was excessive to the amount of $18,720,000, if the soldiers received $30 per month under House bill No. 1, and if those who served one year and over were three times as many as those who served under one year, and the latter were averaged at "$240 per year," he then draws the conclusion that "the report of the Pension Bureau is wrong by $12,480,000."

While not conceding, I will assume that these figures are correct for the sake of this argument. In making his computation he accepts the figures of the Pension Bureau in its annual report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, as to the number of men who served six months and under one year as 107,566, and the number who served three months and less than six months as 44,510 men—designated in his speech as hundred-day men—and the number who served for a less period 1,590, making an aggregate of 153,666. But he does not accept the total given by the Pension Bureau of all soldiers on the pension roll as 529,884. Waiving this, however, he estimates that there are 335,046 soldiers who, at the rate of $30 per month, would receive $120,616,560, and 153,666 short-term men who, at the rate of $20 per month, would receive $36,879,840. This totals $157,496,400. He then deducts $104,980,110, the amount paid Civil War soldiers last year, according to official reports, which leaves $52,516,290 as the cost of the bill.

It clearly appears that this estimate is not correct; first, because it does not contain any account of the Mexican soldiers or the pensions to be paid to them; and, secondly, the $104,983,110 includes both the pensions paid during the last year to the soldiers now living, as well as to the soldiers who died within that time. Hence, it must follow that in order to show the actual cost of the Sherwood bill it is necessary to deduct from the amount paid last year the amount of pensions which have lapsed by death. Or, to look at this in another way, the appropriations by the Sherwood bill, so called, include, for the living soldiers first, pensions at the rate paid them during the last year; secondly, all of the pensions which were paid to their comrades who died during the last year; and, third, increases provided in the present bill.

Or, in other words, if $12,480,000 was paid to 52,000 soldiers who died since the date which makes the basis of the report of the Pension Bureau, then this amount, or at least so much of it as represents pensions which lapsed during the last year, ought to be added to the total of $52,516,290 in order to arrive at the total cost of the Sherwood bill. I am assuming, without admitting, that the figures given by him as a basis of his computation are correct. Later on in his speech of January 8, 1912, the conclusion is reached that the bill as it passed the House will cost only $43,056,210.

On January 22, 1912, in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Pensions, he said, (P. 26 of Hearings before the Committee on Pensions in the United States Senate), his bill in the original form as reported to the House would cost $34,250,000, and that as it passed the House and was then pending in the Senate, it would cost $45,730,890.

I have the very greatest respect for Gen. SHERWOOD because of the great services he rendered his country during the war, and I know his love for the old comrades, but it does seem to me that he can not be very clear as to the cost of his bill, in view of the varying estimates he has given.

His first bill he thought would cost $17,500,000; his second bill, $22,500,000; his third, the disability bill, $3,600,000; and his fourth bill, according to his report to the House on August 11, 1911, would cost $28,858,000. In his speech on January 8, 1912, he estimated the cost of this bill as it passed the House at $43,056,210. In his testimony before the Senate Committee on Pensions (p. 26) he thought the cost of the original bill, as reported to the House, would be $34,250,000, and as the bill then stood in the Senate he believed it would cost $45,730,000.

ELEMENTS OF UNCERTAINTY.

One of the elements of uncertainty in the estimated cost of the bill is the ratio of the number of soldiers now living and drawing pensions who served less than a year to those who served one year and over. An examination of the speech of January 8, 1912, will show that the conclusion reached was based not upon actual statistics of any reliability, but purely upon probabilities. Without presuming to go into details it was then attempted to show that the number of men who served under one year is materially greater than that contended for by the Bureau of Pensions, and that the number who served one year and over is proportionately less. This computation is arrived at on the assumption that none of those who enlisted for short terms ever reenlisted, when, as a matter of fact, there were many soldiers who enlisted twice and three times in the service.

After this speech was made I called the attention of the Pension Bureau to the estimated cost of the Sherwood bill, as contained in the department's letter of April 11, 1911, to Gen. SHERWOOD, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and also to the criticisms of this report as contained in the speech by Gen. SHERWOOD under date of January 8, 1912, and asked what, if any, modifications they might desire to make. Under date of January 25, 1912, the Secretary of the Interior answered my letter, and I ask that it may be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. From this letter the following facts may be gleaned:

On June 30, 1911, there were on the pension roll 471,336 soldiers who would be entitled to the increased rates of the bill. From this is deducted 15,000, being the deaths from July 1, 1911, to January 1, 1912, leaving 456,336 soldiers who would be entitled to the increase under the Sherwood bill. Under the form of computation hereafter given the cost under section 1 of the bill is $73,244,048. Under section 2 of the bill, which is for disability pensions, the estimate is $2,500,000, making a total of $75,744,048. There are no figures now in the Pension Bureau from which the officials can give to a mathematical certainty the exact number of the long-term or of the short-term soldiers, but they reach the number with substantial accuracy in the way I now give.

MODE OF ESTIMATING COST.

On June 27, 1890, a law was passed granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Civil War who were incapacitated from the performance of manual labor. Under this act 669,463 invalid claims were filed.

The Commissioner of Pensions at that time adopted the practice of making out and placing with the files in each case a statistical card, upon which was entered the name of the soldier or sailor who applied for the pension, the date of his enlistment and date of his discharge, together with other data. Some cards contained data only with reference to one enlistment, when there may have been two enlistments, or even three enlistments. The pensions under the act of June 27, 1890, depended upon the disability to perform manual labor and not upon the length of service.

These cards were later withdrawn from the files and were tabulated. At that time it appeared that 71 per cent of those who had filed their claims under this law served one year and over; 12.5 per cent served nine months and less than one year; 7.5 per cent served six months and less than nine months; and 8.4 per cent served three months and less than six months.

Gen. SHERWOOD (see his testimony on page 34 of the hearings before the Committee on Pensions of the United States Senate, Sixty-second Congress, given January 22, 1912) and others who criticized these figures contend that the ratio of those who served one year and more to those who served less than one year is materially less than the figures of the department, and that at the close of the war 45 per cent of the soldiers were short-term soldiers, serving less than one year. His estimate is based upon the figures contained in the roster of the War Department, which gives the number and term of enlistment. But this roster fails to show what was the fact, namely, that many of those who are included in the short-term enlistments reenlisted a second and even a third term, so that the ratio of those who served less than one year to those who served one year and over is materially different from the ratio deducible from the figures giving merely the numbers and term of enlistment. Hence these figures can not be relied upon. As a matter of fact, the authorities differ as to the number of such reenlistments and variously estimate them at from 370,000 to 716,787, and in a published memorandum of the War Department, issued in 1896, it is estimated that the mean between these two extremes is a fair approximation of those who rendered two or more services during the Civil War, and this estimate makes the number 543,393. Dr. Thompson, the statistician of the Pension Bureau, is of the opinion that 135,848 survivors of the Civil War are now on the pension roll who served two or more enlistments.

As further showing the correctness of the figures of the department and the unreliability of the figures of those who estimate the third-term soldiers at 45 per cent of the total number, Dr. Thompson, in his testimony before the Senate committee on January 22, 1912, states:

> Within the last two days I have found some statistics relating to the Civil War soldiers who were pensioned under the general law. While there were only 12,000, I have had their length of service tabulated, and what does it show? It bears out the length of service of these 475,000 men. That is, 70.7 per cent of those pensioned under the general law served one year and more; 12.6 per cent served nine months and less than a year; 7.7 per cent served six months and less than nine; and 8.1 per cent served three months and less than six months.

In the testimony before the Senate Committee on Pensions, January 22, 1912, Mr. Washington Gardner, past department commander of the Department of Michigan, disputed the figures given by Dr. Thompson, and said (p. 48):

> I can not understand how my good friend here can figure that 71 per cent served one year or more, when the figures I have just read amount to 861,873 out of a total number of enlistments of 2,700,000 plus.

That is, 861,873 was given by Mr. Gardner as the number of the short-term soldiers.

Assuming these figures are correct, they show that the ratio of the long-term men is 68.1 per cent of the total, making a variation of but 2.9 per cent from the estimate of Dr. Thompson.

Further, since this controversy arose the department has been tabulating the cases which came up for review and allowance, beginning January 23, and these figures are furnished me by the department. Between January 23 and 31, inclusive, the total number of cases examined was 1,351. Of these cases 71.5 per cent served one year and over. During the month of February, from 1st to 29th, inclusive, the department reviewed and allowed 4,453 claims. Of this number 73.6 per cent served one year and over. The exact figures furnished are contained in the following table:

Three months	138
Six months	105
Nine months	142
One year	234
Two years	317
Three years	343
Four years	72
Total	1,351
Per cent for one year and over	71.5

February 1–29, inclusive.

Three months	377
Six months	290
One year	870
Two years	1,025
Three years	1,097
Four years	212
Per cent for one year and over	73.6

These tables show with reasonable certainty the correctness of the department's figures. The only uncertainty about them is due to the fact that no record has been kept of the length of service of those who have passed away. The department assumes that the long-service and short-service men have been dying in the same ratio. This is borne out by the statistics which the department has gathered from year to year. And again, the records show that the average age of those who enlisted during the latter part of the war for short terms was greater than the average of those who enlisted during the earlier part of the war and who served for longer periods.

Those who criticize the figures of the department attempt to make much capital out of the fact that its estimates are based upon cards and records more than 20 years old, and therefore are said to be unreliable. A little consideration will show that such criticism is scarcely worthy of notice. It must be conceded that the length of service is an unchangeable quantity. Time can not efface it. The day of muster in and the day of muster out are the same. The length of service of a soldier is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. If the record is to be questioned because of its age, it must follow with equal force that when a man marries and makes a record of his marriage and afterwards of the birth of his children, as he is blessed with each arrival, and a period of 20 years or more elapses, it would be wholly unreliable because of its age. As a matter of fact, as well as of law, the age of a record adds to rather than detracts from its force.

COST OF HOUSE BILL NO. 1.

The estimated increase of House bill No. 1, as shown by the letter of the Secretary of the Interior under date of April 11, 1911, was $75,671,880. By a reference to the letter addressed to me by the Secretary of the Interior under date of January 25, 1912, it will appear that the former estimate was an understatement rather than an overstatement of the cost.

In the first place, it was based upon a proposed bill that did not have the nine-month rate of $25 per month. If this had been included, it would have increased the sum total by $3,345,480.

In the second place, the number of pensioners given in that estimate was 472,603. The total number of survivors on the roll June 30, 1910, was 562,615. In other words, the number of beneficiaries given in the estimate was 90,012 less than the number of survivors on the roll June 30, 1910. The figures used did not include those survivors who were on the pension roll at odd rates, such as $6, $10, $12, $16, $22, and $25 per month. But they were offset by the statistician by the number of those who had been dropped by death from the roll between June 30, 1910, and April 11, 1911.

In the third place, the survivors of the Mexican War were not included, of whom on December 16, 1911, there were 1,398. The beneficiaries not included in this estimate were 21,795. The decrease in the number of survivors on the roll between July 1, 1910, and April 1, 1911, was 24,019. Had the 21,795 soldiers been included the estimated cost would have been in excess of $80,000,000.

On December 16, 1911, the Secretary of the Interior furnished the chairman of the Committee on Pensions of the United States Senate the following statement of the cost of House bill No. 1 (Sherwood bill). With the permission of the Senate I should like to insert the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

[1] Includes 1,398 survivors of the War with Mexico.

Mr. POMERENE. This shows the number on the pension roll June 30, 1911, to have been 471,336. The decrease due to death from July 1, 1911, to January 1, 1912, was about 15,000. The average increased cost per pensioner is $160.50. Multiplying this by the number of deaths (15,000) would decrease the estimate $2,407,500, leaving the net increase in the value of the pension roll at $73,244,048.

I believe these figures are not very far from the exact increase in cost. There is, however, likely to be a probable increase, as will appear from the following facts.

Some time ago a comparison of the reports of the Pension Bureau with the records of the War Department showed 60,000 soldiers listed in the War Department whose names did not appear in the records of the Pension Office. They are designated in the Pension Department as the "unknown army." Since then a very substantial number of these have applied for pensions, and their names now appear upon the pension roll. It is not improbable that additional applications may be made by those who are included in this "unknown army" still surviving. If so, to that extent the cost of the bill, if it should become a law, would be increased.

PENSION LEGISLATION.

Up to June 30, 1911, the Government paid in pensions to Civil War veterans $3,985,719,836.93. Since that date it has paid out approximately another $100,000,000. Last year alone it paid out $157,325,160.35. I do not refer to these figures complainingly. I am glad the old soldiers got the pensions. It is not a question of how much we want to pay; the question is, How much can we pay?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. BROWN. Is not the question rather what we ought to pay?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in one sense of the word that is true, but when it comes to what constitutes the "ought" or the "duty" in the premises we must look at it from two viewpoints—one from the standpoint of the soldiers and the other from the standpoint of the men who pay the taxes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Ohio says we should pay what we can pay. Is not the proposition that we can pay what we ought to pay?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not know that we can pause, when it comes to a question of this kind, to analyze to a hair's breadth the nicety of the proposition. I believe in liberal pensions—very liberal pensions—but when it comes to a question as to what we ought to do, let me submit this suggestion: Two men appear before us; one man is poor in this world's goods; he is decrepit; he is aged; and we give to him a $30-a-month pension. I want to say that if it is necessary to his comfort that he shall have $50 per month I am willing to give it to him; but I would treat that man differently from the other soldier, who perhaps may have rendered an equal service to his country, but who has been blessed with a goodly portion of this world's goods, who is himself in good health, and is surrounded by the comforts of life. That is my way of looking at the proposition.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. As I understand the position of the Senator from Ohio, he is in favor of the substitute bill that the majority of the committee reported?

Mr. POMERENE. I am.

Mr. BROWN. That bill nowhere makes it necessary to inquire into the property or the condition of the soldier. It fixes two standards, those of age and service alone; that is the only test made in the bill which the Senator now favors. Now, why does he urge that we give consideration to another factor, and that, the condition of each man and his particular needs?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I fear the Senator's question does not address itself to the answer which I made to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. As a matter of fact, if it were left to me alone, I would discriminate between the man who should receive a bounty from the Government and who is rich and the man who is in poverty-stricken circumstances. I am told that there is one pensioner in the State of Ohio who is worth $8,000,000. Let me suggest that, if I am very far wrong in taking into consideration the pensioner's financial condition, I have fallen into the same error that the distinguished author of House bill No. 1 fell into when he inserted in his bill a provision excepting from its bounty those who had an income of $1,000 per year and over.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. May I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it was attempted in the Committee on Pensions to place back into this substitute bill the same provision exempting from the benefits of the act those who had an income of $1,000 per annum?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Florida is correct.

Mr. BROWN. But the committee voted adversely on that proposition.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Nebraska is correct in that statement.

Mr. BROWN. And by an overwhelming majority the House struck that provision out of the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator is again correct.

Mr. BROWN. And, as a matter of fact, it ought to be stricken out. I am correct again, am I not?

Mr. POMERENE. In that respect the Senator from Nebraska, in my judgment, is entirely wrong.

Ought we now to add to the pension roll $73,244,048? The original estimates of the Treasury Department showed that the receipts during the present fiscal year would be $33,000,000 in excess of the expenditures. But the receipts have so fallen off within the last few months that it is believed they will not exceed the expenditures for the fiscal year more than about $15,000,000. If so, and the receipts and expenditures for purposes other than the new pension legislation remain about the same during the next year, there would be a deficit at the end of the year due to this bill of the difference between $73,244,048 and the $15,000,000, amounting to $58,244,048. How shall this be met? It must be in one of two ways—either by immediately increasing taxation or by issuing bonds which must be paid by future taxation. Should this be done? We all want to be generous to the old soldier, but we must not be unjust to those who pay the taxes, many of whom are neighbors of the old soldier, and many of whom are deserving sons of his comrades who have passed away.

I do not believe that the great body of the old soldiers, when they understand the situation, will ask the Government to be unduly embarrassed, or to increase taxes, or to issue bonds. That they expect some additional pension legislation I do not doubt. That Congress is willing to give them a reasonable increase is apparent. The only question is, How much?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Is there not another way that this expenditure could be met? Does the Senator not believe that the Government could be administered much more economically, at least for a few years, until the increased pensions were paid?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It could be; but it will not be.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that is a very pertinent inquiry, and I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that I will join with him in every effort that he may make to economize in every line of expenditure by our Government.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I have introduced a bill to reduce mileage. Will the Senator join in that?

Mr. POMERENE. I will join in that.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad to have some support for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would not pay many pensions.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. NELSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield, and to whom?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan. I can not resist him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I thank the Senator. I have thought many times of another means of economy which might be practiced, and I was wondering if the Senator from Ohio had taken it into consideration. We have been in the habit for years of passing what is known as a public-buildings bill, carrying many millions of dollars for the erection of public buildings in places where there has been no demand for them whatever and at several times the cost for which private enterprise would have put up buildings. I was wondering if it would not be better for the Government to spend a little more money on pensions and less on public buildings, in view of the fact that we can obtain offices at a rental price through private enterprise, get just as good buildings as we get now, and make a saving of many millions a year?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, from the long service of the Senator from Michigan in the other House and the vigor with which he looks after the interests of his constituents, I feel quite sure, considering the short term of my public service, that he has, perhaps, asked for many public buildings where I have asked for one, but I am entirely willing to join hands with him now in order to economize in that direction. May I add that before this session began I was advised that the House had already economized in that behalf by reducing the appropriation for public buildings by $16,000,000 in order that they might to some extent help to pay these pensions.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. BROWN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield, first, to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was going to suggest further, in that connection, that while the House may have reduced appropriations for public buildings, the Senator from Ohio ought to reserve his judgment as to the saving accomplished until the bill finally becomes a law, because it is quite certain before it gets through it will carry an appropriation quite equal to the usual amount.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, when it comes to a matter of economy in the public expenditures, I will be under great obligations to the Senator from Michigan if he will call my attention to the particulars in which we can save, and I will help to hold up his hands.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BROWN. With all these economies accomplished, of course the Senator then would be willing to pass the bill in the form carrying the larger amount for the old soldiers?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I would save the money before I attempted to expend it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that, instead of halting the great constructive work of the country on our waterways, our public buildings, and in cooperation with the States in the making of good roads, and so forth, it might be well for Senators who are pressing this bill to provide us with an additional tax upon wealth, so that the great constructive work of the country will go on, and a great and powerful Nation like this, one of the wealthiest in the world, may not plead inability to go on with its constructive work simply because it is proposed to give a few million dollars more to the pensioners of the country.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's suggestion is well worthy of consideration. I think, Mr. President, that I owe an apology to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I believe he desired to interrupt me.

Mr. NELSON. Not at all. It is not a serious matter, Mr. President. It was in connection with the question asked by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] about reducing mileage. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that I believe there is also pending a bill to abolish the Senate barber shop in the interest of economy.

Mr. KENYON. And also the Senate bathrooms.

Mr. BROWN. There is also a proposition——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must address the Chair and get the consent of the Senator who has the floor before interrupting him.

Mr. BROWN. I simply want——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, Mr. President, I yield.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me, I simply want to say that there is another proposition which would effect a very great economy, and that is the suggestion that the Senate be abolished; and I am not so certain but what that suggestion is a good one.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, if we are going on to expend millions upon millions without any reference whatsoever to the burdens that will be placed upon the taxpayers of this country, it may be that at some time the Senate will be abolished.

The representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic recognize the true situation. Past Commander Eli Torrence, when before the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, said—and I commend these words to the Senator from Nebraska:

> Of course, if the Government is not able to do what we ask, I do not think any old soldier wants the Government to do it. I would be sorry if any old soldier felt that way.

And Past Commander Samuel S. Burdett, in speaking about what the Government had done, said:

> If nothing else in our favor were ever done in our day, it never could be said, to-day or in any to-morrow, that the people of the United States were ungrateful to those who served them.

These are statements of true patriots and true citizens, who appreciate their responsibility both to the soldiers and to the public at large.

Before considering what increase shall be made let us pause to consider for one moment what is now being done for these gallant defenders of the Union. Last year the soldiers were paid in pensions $157,325,160.35, not including the $2,517,127.06 expended in the cost and maintenance of the Pension Bureau. And that we may be able to appreciate this a little more fully let me refer especially to my own State.

In Ohio last year there were 86,474 pensioners who received $15,638,286.83 in pensions. The population of Ohio, according to the census of 1910, was 4,767,121. In other words, there was paid as pensions in Ohio an amount equal to a tax upon every man, woman, and child therein, $3.28, or for each average family of five in the State, $16.40. It is now proposed to add approximately $75,000,000 more to the national pension roll, and as about 10 per cent of this amount would go to the State of Ohio, it would add $7.85 more per family, thus raising the total amount from $16.40 to $24.25; and if this is done it must be by an increase in revenues to be raised by taxation, and it is a tax whether it be collected by direct or indirect methods.

SERVICE AND OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

Thus far I have only considered the question from the standpoint of whether or not the Government has the necessary revenues with which to pay this increase. But there is still another side to it. Last year there was pending before Congress the Sulloway pension bill, which was known as an old-age pension bill. The Sherwood bill is called a service pension bill. Much has been said, and with reason, about the injustice of basing a pension wholly upon age. It is pointed out that under an old-age bill the short-term soldier and the long-service veteran would be pensioned at the same rate. A man who served 90 days would get more pension than the veteran who served 4 years if he happened to be older. I do not believe, therefore, that it is just, as among the soldiers themselves, to adopt the old-age principle alone. But, on the other hand, it is just as inequitable to adopt the present Sherwood bill, even though it is called a service bill. Under its provisions the man who spent one year in camp would get the same pension as the old veteran who gave four years of hard service in the field. The man who may be 62 years old, who served 1 year in camp, is now in good health, and has a competency, would get the same pension as the old veteran of 80 years, who served 4 years and over in the field, fought 50 battles, and may now be in poor health, infirm, and without enough to satisfy his hunger or to clothe his nakedness.

Again, the man who enlisted for 90 days and never saw any service would get one-half as much as the old man of 80 years who served his country 4 years in the thick of the strife. Is this equitable and just, as among the old soldiers themselves?

Or let us look at it from another standpoint. It is called a service pension bill. Is it? Under its provisions the man who served 90 days gets $15 per month, or $180 per year. In other words, for each year in the future he will get $2 per day for every day he was in the service.

If he served six months, he gets $20 per month, or $240 per year, or for each year in the future he will get $1.33 per day for every day he was in the service.

If he served nine months, he gets $25 per month, or $300 per year, or for each year in the future he will get $1.11 per day for every day he was in the service.

If he served 1 year, or 360 days, he gets $30 per month, or $360 per year, or for each year in the future he will get $1 per day for every day he was in the service.

If he served two years, he gets $30 per month, or $360 per year, or for each year in the future he will get 50 cents per day for every day he was in the service.

If he served three years, he gets $30 per month, or $360 per year, or for each year in the future he will get 33⅓ cents per day for every day he was in the service.

If he served four years, he gets $30 per month, or $360 per year, or for each year in the future he will get 25 cents per day for every day he was in the service.

Now, I appeal to the old soldiers themselves. Is it a just service pension bill that will each year in the future pay to the 90-day man $2 per day for every day of service he rendered his country, to the 6 months' man $1.33 per day for his service, to the 9 months' man $1.11 per day for his service, to the 1-year man $1 per day for his service, to the 2-year man 50 cents per day for his service, to the 3-year man 33⅓ cents per day for his service, and to the 4-year veteran 25 cents per day for his service? The proposition needs only to be stated to carry its own answer.

It seems to me, therefore, that if any legislation is to be based upon either the principle of old age alone or of service alone we are going to do a very great injustice among the soldiers themselves. It was the belief of the majority of the committee that any pension legislation should combine both the elements of service and of old age. With this purpose in mind the substitute bill was prepared and presented to the Senate. It is based upon what is known as proposition No. 16, contained in the report of the Committee on Pensions to the Senate upon House bill No. 1. It recognizes the element of service and fixes the rates in proportion to the service in the following classes: 90 days, 6 months, 1 year, 1½ years, 2 years, 2½ years, 3 years and over. It also recognizes the element of age and increases the pension according to the age of the soldier. If he is 62 years and less than 66 years of age he gets one rate in proportion to the service he has rendered; if he is 66 years old and less than 70 he gets another rate; if he is 70 years old and less than 75 he gets still a higher rate; and if he is 75 years or older he gets the maximum rate.

Under the provisions of this bill—taking into consideration both age and time of service—the soldiers are divided into 28 different classes. The rate of pension for these several classes appears in the following table:

Age.	90 days.	6 months.	1 year.	1½ years.	2 years.	2½ years.	3 years and over.
62	$13.00	$13.50	$14.00	$14.50	$15.00	$15.50	$16.00
66	15.00	15.50	16.00	16.50	17.00	17.50	18.00
70	18.00	19.00	20.00	21.00	22.00	23.00	24.00
75	21.00	22.50	24.00	25.50	27.00	28.50	30.00

Now, is it not more just to divide this into 28 different classes, based upon age and service, than it is to distinguish to the extent of $5 per month between the 90-day man and the 6-months man, or between the 6-months man and the 9-months man, or $5 per month between the 9-months man and the 1-year man, and to make no distinction between the 1-year man and the 4-year man?

I also ask to insert in my remarks a table showing the age, length of service, number of pensioners, present rate of pension, proposed rate of pension under the new bill, the annual increase per pensioner, and the total increase per annum under the bill.

Proposition No. 16.

Age.	Length of service.	Number of pensioners.	Present rate.	Proposed rate.	Annual increase per pensioner.	Total increase per annum.

75	2 years	4,422	20.00	27.00	84.00	371,448.00
75	2½ years	10,848	20.00	28.50	102.00	1,106,496.00
75	3 years and over	16,929	20.00	30.00	120.00	2,031,480.00

From this table, which was prepared by the department and submitted to the committee February 2, 1912, it will appear that the number of soldiers estimated to receive the increase of pension is 420,965; the annual increase to the pension roll will be $24,112,578, which is somewhat in excess of the estimate of the cost to the Government under each of the Sherwood pension bills introduced prior to the presentation of House bill No. 1, April 4, 1911. Under this bill the average increase per pensioner will be $57.27. The increase and disbursement for the pensions will be the first year $11,454,000; the second year, $33,000,000; the third year, $21,000,000; the fourth year, $19,200,000; and the fifth year, $17,400,000.

The majority of the committee, who favor this bill, will concede that it will not do even and exact justice in its administration to all of the old soldiers. But we claim for it:

First. Looking at it from the standpoint of the Government, it carries as great an expenditure as the revenues will justify.

Second. As among the soldiers themselves, we insist that it is more equitable than the Sulloway bill, in that while the Sulloway bill recognizes age as the only basis under its provisions for the allowance and grading of a pension and fails to take any account of the service of the soldier, the substitute bill recognizes the service of the soldier and grades his pension according to his age, disability, and the length of his service.

Third. It is better than the Sherwood bill, which takes no account of the age of the soldier as an element of disability, gives to the 90-day man one-half as much as the 4-year veteran, and makes no distinction whatsoever between the man who served one year and the man who served two years, three years, four years, or longer. It pays both according to the service he rendered and according to the disability of his advancing years.

Mr. President, the Sherwood bill has its friends and the Sulloway bill its friends. The one is based upon service and the other upon old age. If the Sherwood bill does not become a law, its friends will be disappointed. If the Sulloway bill does not pass, its friends will feel somewhat aggrieved. All legislation is a compromise. It is always more gratifying to grant favors by legislation than it is to deny them.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. To what bill does the Senator refer when he mentions the Sulloway bill?

Mr. POMERENE. I refer to the one introduced in the House. I think it was introduced on the same day that House bill 1 was introduced.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. Just one moment, until I may answer the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was about to suggest to the Senator that the same bill has been introduced in the Senate, also, and was one of the bills under consideration.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator for the information. The Sulloway bill was introduced in the House April 4, 1911.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I remember correctly—Mr. SULLOWAY comes from my State—the Sulloway bill passed the House during the last Congress.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is correct.

The bill which is reported out by the committee and is sometimes known as the McCumber or Smoot bill, will not grant all that the friends of either the Sulloway or Sherwood bill desire. But, in my judgment, it grants every dollar the Government can now pay, having due regard to the amount of its revenues and to its other obligations. If it passes, I am sure that it will be reasonably satisfactory to the soldiers themselves, and it will cause no adverse criticism among the people. They will approve it, and I believe that when the old soldiers fairly understand the situation they, too, will approve it.

I hope that it may speedily become a law, in order that the soldiers may get the benefit thereof.

Mr. President, when this matter was before the Senate committee I favored placing in the bill a section which would provide for the payment of certain attorneys' fees. I did that because it seemed to be the consensus of opinion among those who testified before the committee on that day there was a real need for it, and that it would materially aid the department in allowing the claims to the old soldiers and thereby hasten the day when they could get the benefit of the pensions allowed under this bill.

The other day the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire and the distinguished Senator from New York both called attention to the fact that in their judgment it was unnecessary, and I am willing to accept their judgment in that behalf; and for that reason I favor striking out that provision which is in the McCumber bill.

[1] Includes 1,398 survivors of the War with Mexico.

The total number who would be entitled to the benefits of the proposed bill, based upon the roll as it existed June 30, 1911, is 471,336. The estimated decrease in this number due to deaths from July 1, 1911, to January 1, 1912, is about 15,000.

The average increase per annum per pensioner is $160.50.

This would cause a reduction in the above estimate, due to deaths, of $2,407,500, leaving the net increase in the value of the roll $73,244,048.

The following summary shows the number of pensioners on the roll who would be entitled to the respective rates provided in this bill:

	Amount per annum.
21,657 pensioners, at $15 per month	$3,898,260
29,685 pensioners, at $20 per month	7,124,400
62,520 pensioners, at $25 per month	18,756,000
357,474 pensioners, at $30 per month	128,690,640
471,336	158,469,300
Average annual value of each pensioner under this act, $336.21.
Deduct $336.21 × 15,000	5,043,150

It will be observed that the foregoing estimate does not differ materially from that furnished by the department to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives under date of April 11, 1911. The estimate at that time was based upon a copy of a proposed bill which did not provide a rate of $25 per month for those who served nine months and less than one year. The bill as it passed the House makes provision for nine months' service at $25 per month, and the increased cost due to this provision practically overcomes any reduction which would naturally be expected on account of deaths among the survivors of the Civil War since July 1, 1910.

In the former estimate the pensioners who were receiving less than $12 per month were omitted because of the small number involved, as were likewise those pensioned at odd rates, such as $16, $22, and $25 per month, for the same reason. However, in order to make this estimate as accurate as possible, it has been thought advisable to include as nearly as practicable all those pensioners on the roll who may have title under this bill. The former estimate did not include the survivors of the War with Mexico, as the bill then under consideration made no provision for that class of pensioners.

The actual cost of the bill for the first year after its passage would depend upon the number of certificates issued. If 200,000 should be issued within the first year, the increase in the disbursements for pensions would reach approximately $32,100,000 and make the total expenditures for pensions amount to about $184,000,000 for the first year. The maximum cost of the bill would occur in the second year after its enactment, provided the Bureau of Pensions would be able to settle all claims filed under the act in that time. The claims allowed the second year would carry on an average about one year's arrears, the increased rate commencing from the date of filing the application in the Bureau of Pensions. The cost for the second year after the enactment of the bill would very largely exceed that of the first year, being about $87,000,000, which would make necessary a total appropriation for pensions for that year of probably $236,000,000. However, the estimates for the third year would show a marked decrease, as the arrears carried by the claims adjudicated the second year would no longer appear as a factor. This, in connection with the death rate, would cause a probable reduction in the disbursements for the third year of $30,000,000.

In the estimated cost of this bill the death rate for the first, second, and third years has been fully taken into consideration.

The enactment of this bill into law would not, by implication, repeal any existing law or cause a reduction in the rate of any pensioner.

In regard to section 2, you are advised that under the act of March 3, 1883, any person who is so disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted while in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor is entitled to a pension of $30 per month, while under section 2 of House bill 1 any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and received an honorable discharge and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty and is now unfit for manual labor through causes not due to his own vicious habits or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty resulting in his disability is now unable to perform manual labor would be entitled to a pension of $30 per month.

It is a very difficult matter to give any accurate estimate as to the increased cost which would result from the second section of this bill, in view of the fact that each person to be entitled to the $30 rate thereunder must have been wounded in battle or in line of duty or must have been disabled from some disease or other cause incurred in the line of duty and be unfit for or unable to perform manual labor. It is not believed, however, that the number of beneficiaries under this section would exceed 15,000. The increase in the disbursements due to this section would probably, therefore, not exceed $2,500,000 per annum. Before the allowance of a claim under this section it would be necessary to have the applicant examined by an examining surgeon or board of examining surgeons, and the increased cost due to such medical examinations would probably reach about $200,000 per annum.

Very respectfully,

You will see that under section 1 the number of pensioners on the roll June 30, 1911, who would be entitled to the increased rates provided in this bill was 471,336. From this is deducted 15,000 on account of deaths from July 1, 1911, to December 30, 1911, leaving 456,336. The increase under this section, with the deaths deducted, is $73,244,048 per annum.

The increase per annum under the second section of the bill is estimated at $2,500,000, which added to the increase under section 1 gives a total of $75,744,048. This is the increase per annum to which the survivors of the Civil War on the pension roll January 1, 1912, would be entitled if this bill should be enacted into law. As a matter of fact, the 15,000 deducted on account of death is slightly in excess of the actual figures. The actual decrease in the number of survivors of the Civil War on the pension roll, ascertained since the estimate was made, is 15,197. However, the number of beneficiaries under the bill is 88.9 per cent, which would make a decrease in the number of beneficiaries of 13,510, instead of 15,000.

These estimates are based upon the actual condition of the pension roll as shown by the records of the Bureau of Pensions. The rate received by each pensioner included in the estimates is a known quantity. The length of service of the survivors of the Civil War is approximate, but it is believed to be based upon the most reliable data which can be obtained from any source. On June 27, 1890, an act was passed granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Civil War who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents. Under this act a large number of claims were filed based on service during the Civil War. The Bureau of Pensions at that time devised statistical cards. A card was made out for each case in which a certificate was issued. This card gave the name of the soldier or sailor who was an applicant for pension, the date of his enlistment, and the date of his discharge, together with other data. When the certificate was issued the card was completed and withdrawn from the other papers. Four hundred and seventy-five thousand two hundred and thirty-seven statistical cards were thus obtained relative to the survivors of the Civil War.

A copy of the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions will be forwarded to you, under separate cover, and on page 18 thereof you will find the estimated length of service of the survivors of the Civil War on the pension roll June 30, 1911, based upon the percentages obtained from the data compiled as above described. From this data it appears that 71 per cent of the soldiers of the Civil War served one year or more, 12.5 per cent served nine months and less than one year, 7.5 per cent served six months and less than nine months, and 8.4 per cent served three months and less than six months.

On account of the large number of cases from which the data were obtained relative to length of service of survivors of the Civil War, it is believed, as before stated, that this data may be accepted with absolute confidence.

The statement has been made that these statistics were compiled from reports made 20 years ago and that such statistics are of no present value; that there were only 283,734 claims filed under the act of June 27, 1890, to June 30, 1892; that these claims represented the long-service veterans; and that comparatively few claimants under this law were short-term soldiers. It is further contended that the whole body of short-term soldiers who filed their claims under the age pension law of February 6, 1907, are not included in the latest table of the Commissioner of Pensions, upon which was based the estimated cost of House bill No. 1.

The annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1892, has been quoted to show that only 283,734 new pension claims were filed up to and including June 30, 1892.

As a matter of record, there were 493,599 invalid claims filed under the act of June 27, 1890, during the fiscal year 1891 and 175,864 invalid claims filed during the fiscal year 1892, making the total number of invalid claims filed under the act of June 27, 1890, to June 30, 1892, 669,463 instead of 283,734.

The table quoted to show that 283,734 new pension claims were filed up to and including June 30, 1892, refers to the number of Army invalid pensioners under the act of June 27, 1890, at the close of the fiscal year 1892. On that date there were, in addition to the 283,734 Army invalid pensioners, 9,334 Navy invalid pensioners under that act, making the total number of survivors of the Civil War on the pension roll under the act of June 27, 1890, at the close of the fiscal year 1892, 293,068; while, as before stated, the number of claims filed by those who participated in the Civil War under this act to June 30, 1892, was 669,463.

Under the act of June 27, 1890, it was not necessary that the disability from which a claimant was suffering be shown to be due to his military service. A man who served 90 days and was honorably discharged and who was wholly disabled for the performance of manual labor was entitled to $12 per month—the maximum rate provided by that bill—and the person with a long service had no advantage whatever under this bill over the person with a service of 90 days.

There is no data whatever available to show that the persons who filed claims under the act of June 27, 1890, on account of service in the Civil War were long-service veterans.

The length of service during the Civil War is an unchanging quantity. It is the same to-day as it was when the statistics which have been used were compiled.

During the first few years after the passage of the act of June 27, 1890, a very large number of claimants did not allege more than one service. It was not the practice at that time to call upon claimants for data as to other service than that alleged; hence the cards from which this data was compiled show in many instances but one service. It has since been discovered that the claimants in thousands of cases had either a prior or a subsequent service during the Civil War to the one upon which the pension was granted. It has been estimated by different authorities that there were from 370,000 to 716,787 reenlistments during the Civil War. In a published memorandum by the War Department in 1896 it is estimated that the mean between these two extremes is a fair approximation of the number of persons having two or more services during the Civil War. The number of such persons, therefore, is estimated by the War Department as 543,393. From this estimate it is believed that there are at least 135,848 survivors of the Civil War now on the pension roll who had two or more services during the Civil War.

The figures obtained from an examination of the rosters of different regiments to show the length of service are therefore wholly unreliable, because such rosters do not show any other service which may have been rendered by the members of any particular regiment. No data could therefore be obtained from the rosters relative to the additional service rendered by the 543,393 persons who reenlisted.

The average length of service as obtained from the statistical cards in the Bureau of Pensions is too low rather than too high, due, as before stated, to the fact of no reference being made to prior or subsequent service in thousands of the claims adjudicated during the first few years after the passage of the act of June 27, 1890.

The statistical cards which have been referred to related to all classes—enlisted men as well as officers. Within the last two years, however, the papers in the pension case of each surviving officer of the Civil War on the roll have been drawn from the files and the length of service of each officer obtained therefrom and noted on cards. From the data thus secured it is shown that of the number of officers who served in the Civil War who are still living 36 per cent served three years and over, 25.9 per cent served two years and less than three years, 18.4 per cent served one year and less than two years, or 81 per cent served one year and over, and that only 18.8 per cent served three months and less than one year. While the average length of service of all pensioned survivors of the Civil War (enlisted men and officers) shows that 71 per cent served one year and more, it is shown that 81 per cent of the officers served one year and over. The average length of service of the surviving officers of the Civil War, as such officers, has not been used in estimating the cost of this bill.

The first estimate made by the department on the bill H. R. No. 1 was under date of April 11, 1911, in a communication addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives. The estimate at that time was based upon a copy of a proposed bill—which did not provide a rate of $25 per month for those who served nine months and less than one year. In that estimate, therefore, all persons who served six months and less than one year were embraced in the $20 rate provided for six months' service. It has been stated that so far as could be learned no regiment of nine months' men was ever enlisted during the Civil War. The records show that on August 4, 1862, a call was made for 300,000 militia to serve nine months. Under this call the number of men furnished by the different States was 87,588. The State of Massachusetts furnished 16,685 men under this call, the State of New Jersey 10,787, and the State of Pennsylvania 32,215.

If the estimate had been made at the $25 rate for those who served nine months and less than one year, there would have been an increase in the estimate of $3,345,480.

It has also been claimed that the estimate of April 11, 1911, did not take into consideration the number of survivors who had been dropped from the roll on account of death between June 30, 1910, and that date. The number of beneficiaries given in the estimate of April 11, 1911, was 472,603. The total number of survivors on the roll June 30, 1910, was 562,615. The number of beneficiaries, therefore, given in the estimate was 90,012 less than the number of survivors on the roll June 30, 1910.

In the estimate of April 11, 1911, the survivors of the Civil War on the roll at such rates as $6, $8, $10, $16, $22, and $25 per month, as well as a large number of others at odd rates, were omitted, there being such a small number at each of said rates. It was then considered that the number at the rates above given would be offset by the number of survivors dropped from the roll on account of death between June 30, 1910, and April 11, 1911.

The survivors of the Mexican War were not included in the estimate of April 11, 1911, as no provision for them was made in the bill at that time.

If the survivors at the various odd rates given above had been included in the estimate the number of beneficiaries under the bill would have been increased by 21,795. Had such beneficiaries been included, together with those who served nine months and less than one year—at the increased rate for such service—the estimate then made would have been in excess of $80,000,000.

The decrease in the number of survivors on the roll between July 1, 1910, and April 1, 1911, was 24,019. The number of beneficiaries under the bill as given in the estimate of April 11, 1911, was 84 per cent of the total number of survivors on the roll. Had a deduction been made in the number of beneficiaries on account of death there would have been a decrease of 20,176 at that time. To offset the number dropped on account of death, however, as heretofore stated, there were 21,795 pensioners at odd rates not included in the estimate, which would make practically no change in the result obtained.

The chairman of the Committee on Pensions of the United States Senate, in his letter asking for an estimate on the bill H. R. 1 after it had been passed by the House of Representatives, requested that the fact appear that the number dropped on account of death had been taken into consideration in such estimate. In this estimate the survivors of the Civil War on the roll June 30, 1911, at such rates as $6, $8, $10, $16, $22, and $25 per month were included, and as has heretofore been shown, 15,000 deducted on account of the number dropped for death between June 30, 1911, and January 1, 1912.

The average increase per pensioner to those entitled to the benefits of this bill is given as $160 in the estimate made April 11, 1911, while in the estimate made December 16, 1911, the average increase per pensioner for those entitled to the increased rates is $160.50. This slight increase in the average rate is due to two causes: Those who served 9 months and less than 1 year have been figured on a basis of $25 per month in the last-named estimate instead of $20 per month as in the former one, and the pensioners at the lower and odd rates have been included, which was not done in the former estimate. The rate of increase to those pensioned at the lower rates is of course considerably higher than the rate of increase to those pensioned at the higher rates. There has been no statement made in any of the estimates that the average increase for all the survivors of the Civil War on the roll would be $160.50; this average relates exclusively to those who would be entitled to the rates provided in the bill.

Referring to the statement that the whole body of short-term soldiers who filed their claims under the age pension law (act of Feb. 6, 1907) are not included in the latest table, you are advised that since the passage of the act of February 6, 1907, the number of original claims allowed under that act is only 21,771. All the other claims allowed under that act have been in behalf of persons previously pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, or under the general pension laws for disabilities contracted in the service, and represent largely the pensioners from whose cases the records as to length of service were obtained.

You will appreciate that the foregoing statements, as well as those in the estimates of April 11 and December 16, 1911, are based upon the reports made to me by the regular officers and employees of the Bureau of Pensions, who have no interest in either side of the controversy so far as I am aware, and who have received no suggestions or instructions except to report the facts exactly as they find them from the records.

It is believed that the estimates made by the department on this bill are as accurate and trustworthy as it is possible to make them under such circumstances. They are not based upon the opinion or judgment of any officer or employee of the department, but upon actual calculations derived from the official records, and in order to overcome them the burden of proof rests entirely upon those who deny their correctness. No criticism has been observed from any source which after full investigation is considered of sufficient weight to warrant a single change being made in these estimates. Upon the contrary, the Commissioner of Pensions now assures me that the estimate submitted April 11, 1911, was in exact accord with the records as they existed on that date; the estimate of December 16, 1911, was in exact accord with the records as they were at the later date. The two estimates were prepared upon a slightly different basis, but there is no discrepancy between the two; they are both correct.

Very respectfully,

WALTER L. FISHER, Secretary.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I had hoped to be able this afternoon to address the Senate on the pending question, but on account of——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator prefer to go on to-morrow?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock, so that we may to-morrow adjourn earlier in the afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. It has been suggested to me that, on account of the lateness of the hour, I give notice that I shall proceed with my remarks to-morrow immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Notice thereof will be entered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to announce that I shall call up the pending bill immediately after the close of the routine morning business to-morrow, so that the Senator from Indiana may proceed.

Mr. KERN. I am obliged to leave the city to-morrow evening.

Mr. GALLINGER. Inasmuch as it has been agreed that we shall meet at noon to-morrow, I hope the Senator in charge of the pending bill will allow us about one hour upon the calendar under Rule VIII.

I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 16, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven possess, we beseech Thee, our minds and hearts, that our motives may be pure, our aspirations noble, our acts just; that we may harmonize our lives with the highest conceptions of right and truth and duty; that our ways may be ways of pleasantness and all our paths be paths of peace. And Thine be the praise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SUGAR SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21213) to revise the sugar schedule, and pending that motion I will state to gentlemen on the other side of the House that if it is agreeable I shall ask unanimous consent that general debate may continue on the pending bill for two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and one-half by myself, at the end of which time the bill shall be taken up under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21213, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one hour by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman allow longer debate than that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. I desire to finish the bill to-day, and I desire to allow some latitude for discussion under the five-minute rule, as it gives more opportunity for Members to extend their remarks in the RECORD. I think two hours is sufficient.

Mr. GARNER. It will take three hours to pass the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have more time than that. There are many gentlemen here who are very much interested in this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is willing to cut out the debate under the five-minute rule and let the bill come to a vote directly after the close of general debate, I am willing to allow further time for general debate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask the gentleman what his purpose is with reference to debate on the income-tax bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I hope to take that bill up late this evening or to-morrow morning.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it the idea of the gentleman to finish that bill to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not prepared to say at this time until this bill is passed.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I have been unable as yet to get any time. I introduced this bill last summer. That is, I introduced a bill placing sugar on the free list. This is my bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield the floor to the gentleman to appropriate a Democratic measure. [Laughter.] This is not his bill. There are a number of bills which have been introduced placing sugar on the free list. The gentleman from Washington is assuming the position of a great many other Members on the floor of this House.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I have looked over the RECORD, and the only bill placing sugar on the free list, which was introduced last session, was the bill introduced by myself. Be that as it may, having introduced this bill, I want to ask an opportunity of addressing this House for at least half an hour on this bill. I desire to get that much time. I can not get it from the gentleman who controls the time on the Republican side, because he does not like the language that I shall use. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Washington will have that opportunity. It will bankrupt anybody who does it, and I have no objection to his being bankrupted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] knows that there are gentlemen upon this side who are opposed to the bill who desire to consume 10 or 12 hours in general debate. Of course, as far as I can control it, I shall not let in any gentleman, no matter what colors he may claim to sail under, who is in favor of the bill. We shall have a perfect understanding on that score. I want to make one further suggestion. The time yesterday was not evenly divided. I think those in favor of the bill must have consumed an hour more in general debate. The Clerk at the Speaker's desk can tell.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of the bill consumed 38 mintues more than those opposed to the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. And here is a generous proposal from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for two hours more of general debate, and the gentleman desires to appropriate 38 minutes more upon that side than we have consumed upon this side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from New York that on day before yesterday I attempted to divide the time equally and allow 11 hours' debate in consideration of this bill on yesterday. Yesterday afternoon before the House adjourned I proposed to have a night session and equalize debate at that time. The objection to doing so came from the leader of the minority [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I made no objection to a night session.

Mr. GARNER. You made the condition so we could not do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Illinois gave notice that he would demand a quorum.

Mr. MANN. A quorum ought always to be present in the House in the consideration of an important bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman knows as well as I do that the demand for a quorum meant we would spend the night calling the roll in order to get a quorum here.

Mr. MANN. That shows it was not the time for the debate if you could not have a quorum here.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, in response to the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], while I am not going to support the bill, I am going to make the same argument he made in 1890 and 1894 on the sugar proposition.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman makes the argument I made then, he will not support the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate close on this bill at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I object to that. I ask the Speaker to put my request to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I move that all general debate on this bill close in 10 minutes, and on that motion I move the previous question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLAYPOOL with Mr. AUSTIN.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia with Mr. OLMSTED.

Mr. CARTER with Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD, who did not vote. I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21213, with Mr. ADAIR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21213, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. PAYNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, general debate is limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I will yield him half of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take the floor in my own right, inasmuch as the other side of the House has already consumed 38 minutes more time than this side. My desire is in accordance with the usual rule and practice of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from New York that I offered a liberal amount of time for debate on this bill, and now offer an equal division of the time between the gentleman and myself. The proponents of this bill are entitled to close, according to all the precedents of the House. If the gentleman from New York desires half of the remaining time, I will yield it to him.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman from Alabama has not opportunity to close the debate, it is his own fault, because he made the motion to close this debate in 10 minutes from now, and his attention was called to it by me, and the figures were given from the desk showing that his side had consumed 38 minutes more than our side. Under all parliamentary law and the practice of the House since I have been a Member of this body I am entitled to these 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The excess time of which the gentleman complains as used by this side was yielded to gentlemen who spoke in opposition to the bill on this side of the House, so that more time has been consumed in opposition to this bill than in favor of it.

I will state to the gentleman from New York that I propose to close this debate, but if the gentleman desires one-half of the time remaining I will yield it to him.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The Chair recognized yesterday first a gentleman on the Democratic side of the House for an hour and next a gentleman on the Republican side, following the usual custom of recognizing first one side and then the other. The last gentleman who was recognized was a member of the committee, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who consumed one hour. Is not a gentleman on this side of the House entitled now to be given recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would answer the gentleman from Illinois by stating that general debate on this bill has been limited to 10 minutes, and the Chair feels that it is only right and proper, in view of that fact, to recognize the gentleman who is in charge of the bill——

Mr. MANN. Breaking over the custom heretofore of giving the recognition first to one side and then to the other?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, much of the time which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] controlled yesterday was yielded to gentlemen who spoke in opposition to the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about recognition. He was recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. He was recognized by the Chair, but he yielded most all of his time to gentlemen who spoke in opposition to the bill. The Chair recognizes the fact that those opposing the bill have consumed the major part of the time devoted to debate on the bill.

Mr. MANN. If general debate has not been closed, I think it would be clear that the Chair would recognize gentlemen on this side of the House. Do I understand that because the gentleman from Alabama moved to close debate that takes away the right of recognition from this side of the House and transfers it to the other side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not make that statement. The Chair holds that, in view of the limited debate, it is right and proper to recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman desire me to yield half the time?

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to get all the time I can.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I decline to yield to that proposition, but I am willing, if the gentleman wants it, to yield him half the time. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have been a Member of the House now for about 28 years, and this beats all the performances that have ever been exhibited here by any party, by any leader, by any gentleman who is a Member of the House. We are not only confined to five hours' debate on this important measure, but this morning, after offering us an hour's debate in addition to what had already been had, and asking us to consent to yield half of that time to them, when they had had 40 minutes' more time than we had in the debate yesterday, and because we would not accept that monstrous proposition in regard to debate, the gentleman from Alabama immediately moved that general debate be closed in 10 minutes.

Well, now, it is the duty of the Chair, protecting the minority of the House according to the rules and practice of the House, and it is the duty of every gentleman on that side of the House to see to it that I have the 10 minutes. But, no; the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] comes in here and refuses that. "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed that he is grown so great?" [Laughter on the Republican side.]

He not only regulates that side of the House and robs us, his own side agreeing to it, of 40 minutes of debate, but also insists that he must have half of the liberal allowance of 10 minutes in which to close all debate.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the campaign of a year ago last fall was carried on the hypothesis that we on this side of the House had exercised the powers of a Czar, that we had been displaying our power and depriving the minority of their rights. With what face will the gentleman go to the people next fall and say that he has not only equaled our record, but he has gone so far beyond it in playing the Czar that there is no comparison between the two? [Applause on the Republican side.]

He seems to think that anything that the gentleman from Alabama says is going down with the American people. He comes in here with propositions that frighten people to death in the business world, and the only reason that business is not entirely paralyzed is because the business world recognizes the impotency of the gentleman from Alabama to enact any of these measures into law.

He may stand behind the caucus; he may deprive us of our rights on the floor; but there is another tribunal to judge his acts and judge of the measures which he brings in here, and no bland smile, no waving of the hand, no repeating of the parrot cry that "the business people of the country need not be alarmed" will reach the people of the country when they come to cast up the account with the Democratic Party in November next. [Applause on the Republican side.] Go on and walk over us. We are willing to suffer what little martyrdom there is in it for the time being. We are willing you should go on and legislate in caucus. We are willing you should go on and bring in tariff bills here that you dare not submit to the decent discussion and debate that has hitherto taken place in the House of Representatives. You say that no business interests will be affected when you lay the ax at the root of the tree of the prosperity of the country, with the idea that your assurance will be accepted by the American people. There is a forum where we can discuss these questions, and we are willing to discuss them and submit them to the people of the United States, and in that forum there is no gentleman from Alabama to cut us down to five minutes' debate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman [applause on the Democratic side], it is evident from the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that he did not desire time to discuss the bill before the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No man on that side of the House can justly lay the charge at the door of the controlling party in this House that it has not been fair in the consideration of the great measures that have come before the House of Representatives. We have discarded your cloture rule, and by your dilatory tactics to-day you are trying to congest legislation by consuming time, so that at the end of this session you will force us to adopt your drastic Republican rules to pass legislation before this Congress adjourns. Nobody in the country is misled by the tactics you are playing. We propose to show to the American people that we can pass the legislation that this country demands without drastic rules or stifling legitimate debate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I offered to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] the day before yesterday 11 hours' debate on this bill. He declined to accept it.

Mr. PAYNE. I made a proposition to vote on Saturday, and I have had no reply to that, except the gentleman's motion. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from New York declined, and his colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] declined the proposition. Eleven hours' debate on this schedule, that only contains four paragraphs, was more in proportion than all the time you allowed for debate on the Payne tariff bill when you brought it before this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Last night I again offered that side of the House the privilege of debating this bill in a night session, and your leader put us on notice that he would demand a quorum. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] knows as well as I do, and the country knows, that most of the debate that is carried on in this House is carried on when a quorum is not present, and that if we had come here under the demand for a quorum last night it would have been necessary to call the roll most of the evening to obtain a quorum. This morning I again offered liberality in debate, and proposed to allow two hours' debate on this bill before it was voted on; and now, when the general debate is closed, I propose to allow every Member of this House to have an opportunity, within reasonable limitations, to present amendments to this bill and to consider it legitimately.

When the Payne tariff bill was before this House for consideration, did the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] allow any man on this floor to propose to put sugar on the free list or to cut down the high-tariff duties that he was putting on the bellies of the American people? [Applause on the Democratic side.] He brought in a rule here under which there was no opportunity whatever to amend this schedule or to consider it. He drove it through by a party majority. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was willing to have reasonable and liberal debate on this bill, but it does not need debate. The main question involved in this bill is one simple proposition, and that is as to whether you are going to remove the burden of $115,000,000 of taxation that you are levying to-day on the consuming masses of the American people, or whether you are willing to vote to put this schedule on the free list and to tax to a reasonable extent the great idle wealth of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time having expired, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the rates of duty which are prescribed in the paragraphs of this act upon the articles hereinafter enumerated, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), and the said paragraphs and sections shall constitute and be a substitute for paragraphs 216 to 219, inclusive, of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of line 3, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the words: "That on and after the 1st day of October, 1912."

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the Democratic majority of this House for having reported out of the committee one of the features of a bill introduced by me at the last session. I introduced a bill last session placing sugar on the free list. It was the first bill to place sugar on the free list that has been introduced in 10 years. I coupled with it another very important provision which I think ought to have been reported with and as a part of this bill. My bill provided for an increase of internal-revenue tax on tobacco, cigars, and so forth, that would raise our revenue from that source about eighty to ninety million dollars—considerably more than double the present internal-revenue tax on tobacco. There is no doubt about the constitutionality of my proposed tobacco legislation or the amount of revenue that it would bring to the Treasury. If the committee does not agree with me as to the proposed increase of internal-revenue tax on tobacco as a whole, it certainly does at least as to one item—snuff.

The present rate on snuff is about 8 per cent of the retail price. The present rate on sugar is from 36 to 40 per cent of the average retail price. If you will raise the revenue tax on snuff to 40 or 50 cents a pound, it will be paying then about the same rate of tax as our tariff on woolen goods or our present rate of sugar. If you increase the tax on snuff to 50 cents a pound, you can raise about $12,000,000 in revenue from this one item, where you now raise about $2,000,000. Certainly, snuff is a luxury. It can not be classed by anyone as a necessity. No one needs to use it. To most people it is a disgusting habit, and if a man or woman persist in using it he or she ought to be willing to pay a high tax upon it. I say take the tax off of sugar and at the same time raise the tax on snuff. Let the man or woman who wants to use snuff pay as large a percentage on the retail price as a poor woman does when she is compelled to buy sugar for herself and her children. I hope the Ways and Means Committee will report my bill on tobacco, but, if not, certainly you can report it on snuff.

THE PRICE OF SUGAR TO EVERY CONSUMER IS INCREASED THE FULL AMOUNT OF THE TARIFF—SUGAR WOULD RETAIL FOR AT LEAST 1.9 CENTS LESS PER POUND THAN IT NOW DOES IF THE TARIFF WERE REMOVED.

In the discussion of the bill before us the first and most important point to be determined is the effect that the law will have, if enacted, on the price of sugar to the consumer. Will the consumer get the full benefit of the reduction of the tariff? Is the price of sugar to the consumer at the present time increased by the full amount of the tariff? I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the consumer does pay $1.90 a hundred pounds, or 1.9 cents a pound (the amount of our tariff), more for sugar now than we would if this bill were to become a law. This can easily be shown by undisputed statistics available to anyone.

The Statistical Abstract for the United States for the year 1910 gives the price of raw sugar in foreign countries for many years; also the wholesale price of granulated sugar in New York for the same years, which figures in part I give in the first and second columns below.

I add another column, which shows the difference between the raw sugar mentioned in the first column and the wholesale price in New York. In the fourth column I will place the tariff for the same years.

Table of prices of foreign raw sugar; wholesale prices of refined sugar in New York, etc., from 1897 to 1910, inclusive.

Year.	Average cost per pound in foreign countries.	Wholesale price of granulated sugar at New York (per pound).	Difference in cost of foreign sugar and wholesale price in New York.	Tariff on refined sugar.

1908	2.38	4.96	2.58	1.95
1910	2.00	4.97	2.37	1.90

The usual cost given for refining sugar is 40 cents per hundred pounds. I am certain that this is equal to the actual cost. If we add to the cost price of foreign raw sugar each year, as mentioned in column 1, the cost of 40 cents for refining and the $1.95 tariff for the same year, we will find that this sum is from 10 cents to 98 cents less than the wholesale price of sugar in New York. This table could be run back for 40 years, and in no case would we find a single year where the wholesale price of sugar in New York was not larger than the price of raw sugar abroad, plus the cost of refining, plus the full tariff duty for each year. I would like to have some opponent of this bill explain this table on the theory that sugar has not cost the consumer the full amount of the tariff more than it otherwise would cost if the tariff was eliminated. In fact, the wholesale price of granulated sugar in New York during the 14 years given in the table averages 28 cents per hundred pounds plus the full tariff above the cost of like sugar in Hamburg.

On page 6 of the report of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee on the proposed bill is given a comparative table of the price of raw and refined sugar from 1900 to 1911, inclusive. I quote below that part of the table which relates to granulated sugar at the different places.

Granulated sugar.

Year.	Export price at Hamburg.	Wholesale price at New York.	Difference between export price at Hamburg and wholesale price at New York.
1900	2.64	5.32	2.68
1901	2.29	5.05	2.76
1902	1.79	4.45	2.66
1903	2.11	4.63	2.52
1904	2.55	4.77	2.22
1905	3.00	5.25	2.25
1906	2.31	4.51	2.20
1907	2.40	4.65	2.25
1908	2.63	4.95	2.32
1909	2.78	4.76	1.98
1910	3.22	4.97	1.75

It will be noticed that in every year but one—1910—the price of granulated sugar in New York was from 8 to 86 cents plus our full tariff higher in New York than in Hamburg. In 1910 raw sugar in Hamburg was 20 cents a 100 pounds higher than in foreign countries generally. This accounts for the fact that in 1910 there was not quite the full tariff difference between the price of sugar in Hamburg and in New York.

Again, I ask any Member of the House who is opposed to this bill to explain why the wholesale price of sugar in New York is the full tariff rate, and then some, above the price of like sugar in Hamburg if it is not our tariff that makes the difference. Certain it is that during all these years we could have purchased our refined sugar in the markets of Europe for more than the full tariff rate less than the wholesale price in New York. But we would not have been compelled to go to Europe for our sugar. We can always buy it cheaper in Cuba than we can buy it in Europe. The price of sugar in Cuba is regulated by the market price in Europe. It is equal to the market price in Europe less the freight from Cuba. We need no facts or figures to prove this. Cuba must sell her sugar abroad, and naturally she sells it to the country that lies nearest to her. As this country is the nearest, we will always get the Cuban sugar for as much less than the European price as the freight rate to our ports is less than the freight rate from Cuban ports to European ports.

The following table in column 1 shows the price of raw beet sugar at the ports in Great Britain, with the transportation and insurance included at the ports, as shown by the Statistical Abstract of Great Britain, to which I have added 40 cents for refining. The second column shows the wholesale price of granulated sugar in New York. The third column shows the difference between the wholesale price in New York and the import price in Great Britain plus the refining cost of 40 cents per 100 pounds.

Granulated sugar.

Years.	Export price Great Britain, tariff unpaid.	Wholesale price in New York.	Difference between export price in Great Britain and wholesale price in New York.
1900	2.58	5.32	2.74
1901	2.17	5.05	2.75
1902	1.46	4.45	2.49
1903	2.24	4.63	2.39
1904	2.59	4.77	2.18
1905	2.72	5.25	2.53
1906	2.32	4.51	2.19
1907	2.49	4.65	2.16
1908	2.69	4.95	2.42
1910	2.94	4.97	2.03

The average wholesale price in New York for refined sugar for the 11 years mentioned in the above table is $4.84 per hundred pounds, or the difference between the wholesale price in England and New York for the 11 years mentioned in the table is $2.10 per hundred pounds. In the table above I have included 40 cents per hundred pounds for refining over the cost price of raw sugar in England. The Statistical Abstract for Great Britain also gives the export price—the wholesale price—of refined sugar for the years from 1900 to 1911, inclusive, which are as follows:

This makes the average price for the 11 years $2.75 per hundred pounds, the difference between the price in Great Britain and New York averages $2.09 per hundred pounds for the 11 years. The average price in New York, then, is 14 cents per hundred more than the full tariff rate. This would more than pay the cost of transporting the sugar from London to New York.

I might add that frequent confusion occurs in tables by the word "wholesale" price in different countries. The wholesale price as mentioned here in the table I have given is the wholesale price of refined sugar at the refiners' and not the price of the wholesalers, as the word is ordinarily used. The price quoted in England can be absolutely relied upon. It is the price of sugar on board the vessel at the port where it is received, and the price on which duty is paid to the British Government. The price is accurate. No importer could fool the English officer if he tried, and if he did the penitentiary would be opening to him the next day. These prices are more reliable than any you can get from a trade book or trade journal or from the testimony of interested parties before a committee of Congress.

These facts show conclusively that sugar costs the consumer the full amount of the tariff above what he would otherwise pay; but if other evidence were needed, I have here an authority which, I assume, to at least all of the doubting Republicans, will be overwhelmingly convincing. The Committee on Ways and Means that reported the McKinley bill, placing all sugar up to No. 16 Dutch standard on the free list and only placing a half a cent a pound on refined sugar, in its report says:

In 1888 the consumption of sugar in the United States was 1,469,997 tons, or 53.1 pounds per inhabitant. Of this only 189,814 tons (375,904,197 pounds) were produced in the United States, and 1,280,183 tons, or seven-eighths of our consumption, were imported. We have not at hand the statistics of sugar consumption and production for 1889, but the relative proportion of domestic to foreign production was substantially the same. So large a portion of sugar is imported that the home production of sugar does not materially affect the price, and the duty is therefore a tax which is added to the price not only of the imported, but of the domestic product, which is not true of the duties imposed on articles produced or made here substantially to the extent of our wants.

In 1889 the duties collected on imported sugar and molasses amounted to $55,975,610. Add to this the increase of price of domestic sugar arising from the duty and it is clear that the duty on sugar and molasses made the cost of sugar and molasses consumed by the people of this country at least $64,000,000, or about $1 for each man, woman, and child in the United States more than it would have been if no such duties had been levied and the domestic product had remained the same.

This report was made by such eminent Republicans as Messrs. McKinley, Bayne, Dingley, PAYNE, LA FOLLETTE, and Gear.

Notice this language:

So large a portion of sugar is imported that the home production of sugar does not materially affect the price, and the duty is therefore a tax which is added to the price not only of the imported, but of the domestic product, which is not true of duties imposed on articles produced or made here substantially to the extent of our wants.

We do not produce substantially sugar to the full extent of our wants; in fact, we produce but a slight proportion of it. It is stated in the report, as above mentioned, that in 1890 we were producing only one-eighth, or 12½ per cent, of the amount we consumed. With 22 years of an enormously burdensome tariff enacted to promote the production of sugar in the United States, we, for the fiscal year ending 1912, will produce only 20.7 per cent of the amount we consume. This is not a guess, but the percentage as given to me by the Bureau of Statistics. We have only increased in the 22 years since this report was made the proportion of production to a consumption 8 per cent. I will show later that this slight increase in production has cost the people almost $2,000,000,000 to secure it.

That the McKinley law saved the people the full amount of the reduction in the tariff made by it is supported by the minority report of the Ways and Means Committee on the Wilson bill. This report was made two and a half years after the McKinley law went into effect. It reads in part as follows:

The Fifty-first Congress was a protective Congress, and not believing in a tariff for revenue only, wisely repealed the old law, and for the first time in the history of the country sugar came free to the people. This has resulted in a direct saving to the American people of over $200,000,000, less $16,717,726 paid for bounty and $11,000,000 estimated to be due to the producers for this year, which would aggregate $27,717,000, being a direct saving of over $1.25 per year for each person in the United States.

This report was signed by Thomas B. Reed, Julius C. Burrows, SERENO E. PAYNE, JOHN DALZELL, Albert J. Johnson, and John H. Gear.

This enormous saving was made in two and one-half years. These figures can only be true on the theory that there was saved to the people every penny the tariff was reduced.

Congressman Gear, of Iowa, when discussing the McKinley law, said:

It also proves conclusively to my mind that the duty on sugar is not a protective duty, but that it is a purely revenue duty to the extent of 90 per cent of every dollar collected from the people. Sir, this duty in the place of being protective is a bastard revenue which has crept in under the wing of protection and has held a place in our tariff schedules to which it is not entitled by reason of the fact that we can only produce 10 per cent of our consumption, and that all probability of producing sugar equal to our annual increased consumption is an impossibility for the cane growers of this country to accomplish.

We are absolutely, as I have said, at the mercy of the refiners, and how much mercy can the people expect of that patriotic institution called the Sugar Trust? We can from our past experience readily imagine. Why, sir, within a short space of time the sugar refiners, not content with the measure of protection given them by the tariff schedules, have organized a "trust" which embraces within its limits about 70 per cent of all the sugar refiners in the United States.

Congressman Burrows, of Michigan, expressed his views as follows during the debate on the Wilson bill:

Seventy-five millions of people are to be burdened with a tax on sugar in order to hold the votes of the sugar-producing State of Louisiana, and the Sugar Trust has had to have its demands satisfied in order to insure liberal contributions to the Democratic campaign fund; while Republican Senators had but to threaten interminable debate to secure full protection to the industries of their State.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York, said during the debate on the Wilson bill:

I shall vote against each of these popgun bills except that providing for free sugar, and I shall be very glad to join in voting for free sugar, because I believe in it on principle. I shall vote for it, not for the purpose, as you gentlemen claim, of benefiting the Democratic Party, or helping you to masquerade before the people, because every man of you on that side of the House knows that you will not get any from sugar in this Fifty third Congress.

* * * * * * *

I am in favor of free sugar because I believe that the refiner does not need a duty to refine sugar profitably in this country.

* * * * * * *

This is one of the most disgraceful acts of all the long history of tariff legislation. The so-called McKinley bill found this article bearing a heavy duty. This was a revenue duty, because only one-tenth of our consumption was produced in this country and the other nine-tenths was purchased abroad. The tariff became a direct tax upon the consumer and it was paid by him.

* * * * * * *

And so free raw materials have vanished from the bill. Then they have got sugar in. They have adopted my friend's "ad valorem," a rate of 40 per cent on sugar. They have adopted it because it is such a rate as the importer always wants—an ad valorem rate. The importer in this instance was the great Sugar Trust; and the Sugar Trust demanded an ad valorem, and, of course, the Sugar Trust got it—a rate of 40 per cent on raw sugar, 40 per cent on refined sugar, and because the trust does not import refined sugar an additional rate of one-eighth of a cent a pound on that.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, now a Senator, said in a speech on the McKinley bill:

This difference in policy is strikingly illustrated in the way the two bills have dealt with two most important articles of import—sugar and wool. It having been shown after years of experiment that we could only produce about one-tenth of our sugar from cane, the Republican bill has reduced the revenue $54,000,000 by placing sugar on the free list.

Congressman Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, said of the McKinley bill:

This bill puts sugar, for the purpose of the consumer, absolutely upon the free list.

* * * * * * *

The country will save $45,000,000 at least the first year, and it may be more than that, and the industry will not be discouraged thereby. In doing this we test the question, moreover, of the effect of protective duties upon trusts and combinations, for the most flagrant and oppressive trust in the United States to-day is the trust in sugar. If it be true, as our Democratic friends claim, that a protective tariff promotes trusts, then we shall strike down this great trust in this way.

Senator Allison:

My answer to that is that we have encouraged under the tariff the production of sugar nearly since the foundation of the Government, and the result has been that there is about as much sugar produced now as there was in 1850, with a consumption largely in excess of the consumption of any other country in the world. Upon other items where we have the capacity to produce an article to the full amount of the consumption we have found by experiment that the price has been reduced. That is notably so of iron and steel, but it has not been thus far with sugar.

Senator Spooner stated his views in this language:

There has not been a year since 1860 that if the people of the United States (but for the revenue which the war made necessary they should have to carry on the Government and pay the debts which had been entailed) had bought the entire Louisiana sugar produce and dumped it into the Gulf they would not have made from $35,000,000 to $45,000,000.

When the McKinley bill was under discussion Senator CULLOM said:

Whether placing sugar on the free list will cheapen the article to the consumer is doubted by some. I believe it will cheapen it. If it does cheapen it to the people it should never be taken off the free list unless it shall become necessary for revenue purposes.

Hon. Mark H. Dunnell, of Minnesota, said:

The country will applaud the provisions of the bill that places all sugars under No. 16 in color upon the free list, saving annually to the consumers of the article of universal use not less than $56,000,000.

WILL THE CONSUMER GET THE FULL BENEFIT IF THE TARIFF IS REMOVED OR REDUCED?

It is strenuously insisted by those who desire to maintain the present tariff on sugar that if we do remove the tariff the consumer will not get the benefit. I am certain that this claim is not well founded. It certainly has no basis of fact in the history of our tariff on sugar to sustain it. If the proposed law does not reduce the price of sugar to the consumer, why should the sugar industry so strenuously oppose the reduction? If the removal of the tariff will not reduce the price of sugar, it certainly will not hurt the producer. But the truth is the men engaged in the sugar industry knows full well that every penny we reduce the tariff a like penny will go off of the price of sugar to the consumer and they will get a penny less for their products. This has been the case in every reduction of the tariff we have made affecting sugar. In March, 1870, we reduced the price on refined sugar from 5 cents to 4 cents. The following year sugar dropped a full cent a pound as compared with the preceding year. In March, 1883, we further reduced the price of refined sugar a half cent a pound and the next year raw sugar fell about seven-tenths of a cent a pound and refined about 1.2 cents a pound. In 1890, under the McKinley law, the price of refined sugar was reduced 3 cents a pound, and I will later show that the consumer got the full benefit of this 3 cents a pound reduction. In August, 1894, under the Wilson law, the tariff was increased a little over a half cent a pound. If we will compare the two years preceding the date that this law went into effect with the two years following, and take into account the difference in the cost of raw sugar, we will see that the price of sugar was increased the full amount of the tariff. In 1897, by the Dingley Act the tariff on refined sugar was increased by about six-tenths of a cent a pound. If we compare the three years after the Dingley law went into effect with the three years preceding under the Wilson law we will find that sugar advanced the full amount of the increased tariff under the Dingley law over the Wilson law. These facts show beyond dispute that the wholesale price of sugar in New York during 48 years has responded in all instances to the change in the rate of the tariff. It can not be otherwise so long as the United States does not produce practically all of the sugar that it consumes. As long as we do not produce within 10 per cent of the amount that we consume the wholesale price of sugar will equal the import price plus the tariff duty. It is my conviction that the price of sugar will always be the price of imported refined sugar plus the tariff.

I have just said that the McKinley law reduced the price of sugar the full amount that it reduced the tariff. The McKinley bill was introduced in this House in the spring of 1890. In fact, it was well known in the business world for some months prior to that time that such a law was proposed and would probably be enacted. The McKinley Act went into effect in October, 1891. By its provisions the schedule affecting sugar did not become operative until April 1, 1891; so for a year prior to the McKinley Act's taking effect it was known that such a law would probably be enacted and known to a certainty six months before it became operative. This had the effect for a full year or more before it became a law of reducing enormously the importations of sugar and consequently lowering the price of sugar generally at least 1 cent per pound during this time. During March and February, 1891, preceding the 1st of April, the price of sugar averaged about $6.13 a hundred. This was the price in New York on the 25th day of March, 1891. On the 1st day of April, 1891, when the McKinley Act took effect, sugar dropped to $4.50 per hundred, or dropped $1.63 per hundred pounds. In order to determine the effect of the McKinley law on the price of sugar. If we examine the prices for three years immediately preceding April 1, 1891, the day the McKinley Act went into effect, and for three years immediately following April 1, 1891, this will show fairly, but not fully, the amount saved the consumers of this country by the McKinley law. It will be found that the average price of sugar for the three years immediately preceding April 1, 1891, was $7.06 per hundred pounds. This amount would be at least 30 cents per hundred pounds more except for the effect of the McKinley law on sugar the year preceding its enactment, as I have mentioned.

The average price for sugar for the three years succeeding April 1 was $4.42 per hundred; or, the price of sugar for the three years immediately following the McKinley law was, on the market of New York, $2.42 per hundred less than the three years immediately preceding the date the McKinley law took effect. To better and more clearly show you the actual results of the McKinley law and its great saving to the people for the three years following the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1891, I want to give you its results in dollars and cents. During the three years mentioned this country consumed 13,117,000,000 pounds of sugar. By reason of removing the tariff on raw sugar and reducing it to one-half cent per pound on refined sugar by the McKinley Act there was saved to the consumers of this country 2.62 cents per pound, according to the market price in New York, for every pound consumed. Or, if we multiply 13,117,000,000 pounds by 2½ cents per pound we have $327,925,000 saved to the people of this country by the McKinley Act. The expenditures of our Government for the three years immediately following June 30, 1891, were $1,093,000,000. The reduction of tariff on sugar by the McKinley Act saved the people of the United States a sum equal to 30 per cent of this amount, or 30 per cent of the entire cost of running this Government during those three years.

If the McKinley law had provided for free sugar, refined or unrefined, the people during those three years would have saved $70,000,000 more. These figures which I have just given are not based on theory. They are not guesswork. They show exactly the saving that was made, and anyone can get the statistics and verify these figures if he desires to do so.

That sugar was sold at a cheaper price under the McKinley law than it would if a tariff on this commodity was in effect was stated by Congressman Tom L. Johnson, afterwards mayor of Cleveland, Ohio, in a speech in the House on the Wilson tariff, in which he said:

But every man, woman, and child uses sugar. It is one of the prime necessaries of life. And there is not a housewife in the land who will not feel that she is robbed by our "Democratic tariff reform" when she finds that where she got 3 pounds of sugar under the McKinley bill she now, under the Gorman bill, for the same money, gets but 2. You and I, with our official incomes of $5,000 a year, may not feel this tax; Mr. Cleveland, with his official income of $50,000 a year, may not feel it; our colleagues of the Senate, especially those who may have bought sugar front stock at the right time, may not feel it; but the great mass of the people, by whose votes we are here—the great mass of the people who must count every penny of income not sufficient to enable them to live in halfway decent comfort—they will feel it; they will feel it at once, and feel it bitterly. Again will they get an object lesson—that the tariff is a tax. Will you dare to go to them and point to sugar as a sample of the way in which you have carried out your pledges to reduce taxation?

And when they ask you what this tax is for, what will you tell them? Will you quote to them Mr. Cleveland's letter to Mr. Wilson on the propriety of taxing sugar? Will you quote to them Mr. Carlisle's letter that the needs of the Treasurer require the taxation of sugar? I know, and you know, and the people know—I was about to say that every dog that barks in the streets of the capital knows—that the real purpose of imposing this tax is not to give revenue to the Government, but revenue to the boodlers. You can not disguise it from the people, for the people know it already, that the purpose of this sugar tax is to put millions and millions in the pockets of men who are already millionaires by robbing the people. They know that this tax on sugar has been bought through every step of its way, carried by such open, undisguised corruption as has never been flaunted in their faces before. They know that the Sugar Trust has purchased this privilege of taxing them, and that, though the price it may have paid may be millions, it will receive back millions and millions before the Treasury gets one cent.

Congressman Andrew J. Hunter, in speaking before the House on the Wilson bill, quoted from a speech made by William McKinley during the campaign in Ohio, as follows:

We took the tariff off of sugar and now you do not have to pay it. See how we have relieved you from taxation by taking the tariff off of raw sugar and reducing your expenses.

A big saving was made to the people of the United States by the McKinley law, according to JOSEPH G. CANNON in a speech in the House on the Wilson bill, according to the following statement by him made during the discussion:

Mr. Chairman, the discussion that led to the placing of sugar on the free list commenced with the so-called Mills bill in 1888. The matter was considered by the House at length, and under the leadership of the other side the sugar schedule in the Mills bill remained substantially as it had been, with all its inequalities and iniquities, and was retained although this side of the House, I being at that time a Member, made the best fight they could to place on the free list this universal necessity, nine-tenths of which was then, as it is now, produced outside of our own borders. The Democratic Party refused to place it upon the free list then, with full revenues and when it might well have been done. In 1890, there still being necessity for the reduction of the revenues, the Republican Party in the McKinley Act wrote sugar upon the free list, and has saved annually from that time to this from $1.25 per capita alike to the rich and the poor throughout this country.

During the debate on the Wilson bill, after its return from the Senate, Congressman Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, predicted that the price of sugar would advance. Subsequent events proved the prediction. Mr. Grosvenor said in part:

Every man in the United States who buys sugar for the use of his family will find himself called upon to pay something like $1.45 to $1.50 for that which he could hitherto buy for $1.

By the removal of the tariff on sugar in the McKinley law sugar was reduced in price, and the reduction was a great benefit to every citizen in this country. According to Congressman Dingley the duty has to be borne by the consumer, and in the debate on the Wilson bill he said:

I am opposed to raising revenue by means of taxation of 1 or 2 cents a pound on the imports of sugar, because sugar is an article of food as important as flour; so important, indeed, that the amount of money expended by every family in the course of a year for sugar is substantially as great as that expended for flour; and the production in this country is so small, only one-tenth the amount necessary for consumption, that the price here must be fixed by the foreign price plus the duty at the time; that, therefore, the duty must have unavoidably been imposed upon consumption and as much upon the poor man's family as upon the rich man's family.

I believe the experiment which has been tried now for nearly three years of placing sugar on the free list, on the ground that nearly all of our consumption must be imported, has resulted in so cheapening sugar and so reducing the cost of living as to be of advantage to every citizen in this country. A tax of 2 cents a pound is practically a tax of $1.38 for every man, woman, and child, and about $7 on each family, for the reason that there is so little production that the foreign cost and duty determine its price. Such a tax can not be justified on any ground for revenue, because it is clearly an imposition of a tax upon an article of food that distributes itself to every individual; not on account of protection, because experience has shown that it has not developed production of sugar in this country to a sufficient extent to make sugar production a proper subject for the application of that policy.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York:

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the restoration of the duty upon sugar, because it is putting a tax upon every man's breakfast table of at least a dollar a year for each person who sits down to that table. We took the duty off in 1890 and reduced the price of sugar because we produced but 10 per cent of the sugar we used and imported 90 per cent, and I hope that fact will get to the understanding some time of my friend from Kansas [Mr. Simpson].

William B. Allison, for many years Senator from Iowa, said:

We have encouraged the production of sugar abroad to this extent, and this only, that by reducing the price of sugar to our consumers we have encouraged a larger consumption in our own country than would prevail under a duty system such as we have had hitherto, because I take it that all these arguments from beginning to end disclose that everybody now believes that to the extent we have taken this duty off sugar we intend to reduce the price, and the result will be the reduction of the price to the consumer.

A DUTY CAN NOT BE DEFENDED UNLESS THE GOVERNMENT OR THE FARMERS IN THE UNITED STATES GET THE BENEFIT.

I do not believe that a tax on sugar can be justified on the ground that it produces a revenue. If we look upon it as a revenue producer, we can not defend it unless the Government receives the full revenue. I do not believe that we can justify a tariff on any food product that is a necessity on the table of every man, rich or poor; but be that as it may, if we are going to tax the importation of sugar a penny the Government ought to get that penny. If we are going to tax refined sugar $1.90 a hundred pounds, the Government should get the full $1.90. Of course, under our law sugar is imported raw and pays nothing like this tax of $1.90 a hundred pounds, but when the refinery gets through with it it costs the consumer the full $1.90 a hundred pounds for his sugar. The difference between our tariff law on raw and refined sugar is so high that no refined sugar is imported, but the consumer always pays a price for his sugar equal to the price he would pay if the imported sugar was refined, and pays the full tariff of $1.90 a hundred pounds.

One of the many vicious features of our tariff is that the difference between the rate on raw sugar and refined sugar is so fixed that the refinery can get an enormous profit for the refining. This year we will consume 7,760,000,000 pounds of sugar, which will cost the consumer the highest tariff rate of 1.9 cents a pound more than it would have cost him if sugar had been on the free list. If we multiply this number of pounds by 1.9 cents a pound, we will find that our sugar will cost us for the fiscal year 1912 $147,000,000 more than it would have cost us if sugar had been on the free list. Last year the Government received $53,000,000 in revenue on sugar. It will cost the people of our country this year $147,000,000 for sugar more than it ought to cost, of which the Government will get $53,000,000 in revenue. That is to say, that out of every 147 cents that sugar costs the people on account of the tariff the Government will get 53 cents. It is certainly bad enough to collect this $53,000,000 from a tax on sugar. How utterly wrong it is to collect this sum in such a way and by such a method that every time a man pays 53 cents to the Government he must pay 94 cents additional for the benefit of those people engaged in the raising and manufacture of sugar, most of it going to the owners of sugar plantations in Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and the great Sugar Trust monopoly, which is the largest beneficiary.

I do not think that it will be denied that a poor man and the man of moderate means and the ordinary workingman and their families consume practically as large a proportion of sugar consumed in this country as the rich man and his family does. The man who depends upon his wages for the care of his family finds it hard enough to feed, clothe, and educate them without being compelled to pay to the Sugar Trust and to the planters of our island possessions 94 cents every time he pays the Government 53 cents. Then, looking at this tariff from a revenue or a financial point of view, what can be more idiotic than this manner of collecting revenue? I think it far from wise to tax this food product, even though the Government got all the return from it; but what a useless and criminal waste of money to levy a tax of this kind on the people when the Government gets only 35½ per cent of the tax so imposed. If all of our $600,000,000—the revenue that we collect annually—were raised by a similar process, it would cost us more than one billion and a half annually to do so. We would soon become a bankrupt Nation. Nothing but a change to a sane and wise method of raising our revenues could save us. Looking upon this tax, then, simply as a manner of raising revenue, it is an economical failure.

OUR ENORMOUSLY HIGH TARIFF HAS BEEN A FAILURE IN FOSTERING THE SUGAR INDUSTRY, THOUGH IT HAS COST US IN 21 YEARS $1,982,000,000.

The McKinley law granted a bounty to the sugar producer for the purpose of maintaining and fostering the industry. The Wilson law provided for a tariff of 1.3 cents a pound for the same purpose. The Dingley law fixed the tariff rate at 1.95 cents a pound for the same purpose. In fact, for 120 years a high tariff has been maintained for the same purpose.

Mr. CANNON, speaking in favor of the McKinley law in 1890, said:

Yet it is claimed we have not had a fair chance to establish the sugar industry in the United States. My friend from Iowa, Gov. Gear, answered that proposition the other day when he said that for 100 years no article has been protected like sugar. In that time we have collected, in round numbers, $1,500,000,000 of duty upon sugar, and all the time the tariff was high enough for ample protection.

Let us see what it has cost the Government since that time to foster this same industry.

During the four years that the McKinley law was in operation the Government paid in bounties the sum of $36,106,000, or approximately $9,000,000 a year.

When the Democratic Party came into power in 1894 it repealed the bounty on sugar and levied a tariff of 40 per cent ad valorem on all sugar imported except Hawaiian sugar, and one-eighth of 1 per cent on all sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard. This tariff amounted to 1.3 cents a pound more than it would have otherwise cost us if we could have purchased our sugar in the open markets of the world. Had we no duty, the American people would have purchased their sugar for $187,391,345 less than we did.

In 1897 the Dingley bill was enacted, increasing the tariff to 1.95 cents a pound, or increasing it to $1.95 a hundred pounds. The duty on sugar was reduced under the Payne-Aldrich bill to 1.9 cents a pound, or $1.90 per hundred. While the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich bills were in force, from 1897 to June 1, 1912, we will have consumed 91,020,352,914 pounds of sugar. This sugar cost the consumer $1.90 and $1.95 per hundred pounds more than it would have otherwise cost if we had purchased our sugar in the open markets of the world. To recapitulate, our sugar cost us during the four years the McKinley Act was in force $36,000,000 more than it would have cost had we purchased our sugar in the open market. During the three years the Wilson Act was in force, $187,391,345, and during the time the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich bills were in force up to June 1, 1910, $1,759,585,830 more, making a total cost since the McKinley law went into effect of $1,982,000,000.

When I say the sugar cost us during this time $1,942,000.000 more than it would have cost us in the open market, I am figuring on the basis of the bounty we paid during the time the McKinley law was in effect and on the basis that every 100 pounds of domestic and imported sugar cost us the full tariff duty imposed on sugar the year that it was bought for consumption.

Now, I want to ask you, What have the people of this country to show for this enormous sum of money they have expended to promote the culture of sugar beets? What has it accomplished toward this end? In 1890, the date of the McKinley law, we raised of cane and beet sugar 306,000,000 pounds. This amount was increased in 1910 to 1,775,000,000 pounds. Or, our increased production amounted to 1,400,000,000 pounds. This may be said to be a large increase, but let us compare this with our increased consumption. In 1890 we consumed 3,192,000,000 pounds. In 1912 we consumed 7,760,000,000 pounds. So our increased production, brought about by our tariff in 20 years, amounted to 1,400,000,000 pounds, but our increased consumption amounted to more than 4,568,000,000 pounds. So by spending this enormous sum we have been able to foster the beet-sugar industry in this country to the extent of increasing our production nearly 1 pound for every 3 pounds of our increased consumption. Will anyone contend that on this showing, even if we maintain our present enormous tariff, there is any hope or prospect of supplying our home market with home-grown sugar?

So at most, if we should maintain our present high tariff on sugar, we could not hope to increase our production more than 1 pound to every 3 pounds of increased consumption, but during the last 10 years we have not been able to anywhere near maintain this proportion, and the last 5 years we have not increased our production at all, while our consumption is increasing by leaps and bounds.

In 1902 we produced of beet and cane sugar, in round numbers, 1,097,000,000 pounds. We consumed the same year 5,018,000,000 pounds. This year we will produce, as given me by the Bureau of Statistics, of cane and beet sugar 1,715,000,000 pounds, and our consumption will be 7,760,000,000 pounds. It will be seen that during the last 10 years our increased production of cane and beet sugar amounts to 618,000,000 pounds, and our increased consumption amounts to 2,742,000,000 pounds. So in the last 10 years our increased production has been to our increased consumption as the ratio of 1 pound to 4⅓ pounds.

In 1908 we produced of cane and beet sugar 1,715,000,000 pounds. For the fiscal year 1912 we will produce 1,715,000,000 pounds, or our increased production of cane and beet sugar has been nothing.

In 1908 we consumed 6,590,000,000 pounds of sugar. In 1912 we will consume 7,760,000,000 pounds. In the last five years our increased consumption has been 1,170,000,000 pounds, and our increased production of cane sugar and beet sugar has been nothing.

It will be noticed for the 10 years mentioned our cane and sugar-beet production shows an increase of 56 per cent. Our increased consumption in the 10 years mentioned shows an increase of 54 per cent. In the last 5 years our sugar and cane production has not increased at all, not even by 1 per cent, while our increased consumption is 17 per cent.

I want you Members of Congress who have been talking about the marvelous growth of our sugar industry to stop and ponder on these figures for a moment. Can you find anything in these figures to justify the continuance of this tariff in order to promote or encourage the industry?

While our high protective tariff has not been able to increase our production of sugar in five years by a single pound, it has cost the people of this country an enormous sum. There is no bill that the people of this country have been compelled to pay for which they have received so little.

During this five years we have consumed, according to the Statistical Abstract, 36,213,000,000 pounds. If we multiply this by the 1⅝ cents a pound you will observe that within the last five years our present tariff, which is defended on the ground that it will promote our cane and sugar-beet industry, has cost us $687,000,000, without increasing the production of cane and beet sugar one pound.

There have been so many wild statements made in the House in reference to the growth of the production of cane and beet sugar that I will add here a table showing the production of cane and beet sugar for the last 10 years and the consumption of sugar in the last 10 years. This will include the fiscal year which ends in June, 1912. The figures for 1912 are estimated by the Bureau of Statistics, which has given me the figures, stating that they are reasonably accurate and the final figures will vary very slightly, if any, from them. I want to ask the most enthusiastice defender of our present tariff on sugar if he really thinks, in the light of these figures, that if we maintain our present tariff indefinitely we can hope to produce in continental United States more than but a small fraction of the sugar that we consume? On the contrary, do not the facts show our utter failure to promote the sugar-beet industry by this frightful tariff? The table shows:

			Total.	Retained for consumption in United States (continental).

HISTORY OF SUGAR LEGISLATION SINCE 1890.

I think it would be instructive as well as entertaining to give a brief history of sugar legislation, commencing with the McKinley law. The McKinley Act, as heretofore stated, reduced the rate on refined sugar from 3½ to 3 cents per pound and admitted all the sugars free of duty under No. 16 Dutch standard. It also provided a bounty of 2 cents on sugar grown in the United States. This law, so far as it affected sugar, went into effect April 1, 1891. Early in December, 1893, the Wilson bill was reported from the Ways and Means Committee. As reported, it reduced the rate on refined sugar from one-half cent to one-fourth of a cent per pound and provided for a sliding scale downward of the McKinley bounty, to the effect that after July 1, 1895, the bounty should be reduced each year one-eighth of a cent until July 1, 1901, when it should cease and terminate. The provision for the continuance of the bounty and the provision fixing the duty at one-fourth of a cent per pound went out of the bill. The result of this was the placing of all sugar on the free list. This was done by a solid Republican vote, assisted by a sufficient number of independent Democrats to give a majority. So, in 1894 the Republican Party in Congress went on record as a unit in favor of free sugar.

I will print at the end of these remarks a copy of the Wilson bill as it left the House for the Senate as it related to the sugar schedule.

Mr. PAYNE vigorously denounced the Senate for amending the Wilson bill by placing a tariff on sugar, with one-eighth of a cent added for refined sugar. He declares that this was done by the Democratic Senators, assisted by two or three Republican Senators. He calls attention to the fact that it was the Republican Members of the House, assisted by a few Democrats, that placed sugar on the free list in the Wilson bill before it went to the Senate. Following is a brief extract from his speech:

> But the Sugar Trust in 1890 was stronger than we knew. It has gradually absorbed the outside refiners, until now it controls practically the entire refining business and dictates the price to the American consumer. It is said to control the price of the raw product in Louisiana, it being the only purchaser at one-fourth of a cent a pound below the New York market price. It is said to have a contract with the producers of Hawaii, which has three years yet to run, by which it controls the entire output of these islands at the same rate of one-fourth cent below the New York price. Being the greatest customer for Cuban sugar, it is said to have forced down the price of that market so that this commodity brings there one-fourth of a cent less than the same class of goods in the markets of France and Germany.

> The time came for the preparation of a tariff bill. It came to the House from the Ways and Means Committee with a protective duty for the trust and free sugar for the producer. The Democratic House, aided by a solid Republican vote, made sugar free in the bill, and in that form it went to the Senate. Then the State of Louisiana demanded the fulfillment of Democratic pledges. The Louisiana interests demanded a specific rate of duty. These are the interests to whom the pledges were made—the men who had votes in the Senate.
> But the Sugar Trust appeared and demanded an ad valorem rate on both raw and refined sugars, with an additional discriminating duty on the refined. The Secretary of the Treasury drew the sugar schedule and it is drawn exactly as the trust demanded.
> This bill went through the Senate exactly as the trust demanded it. Over six weeks were spent by the Democratic conferees upon this measure and no concession was made as against the Sugar Trust. A proposed change was accepted which, I believe, from the language published in the papers, would have given the same discrimination in the ad valorem rate and an additional differential duty of one-fifth cent per pound instead of one-eighth; of 20 cents per hundred instead of 12½. The Louisiana interests, acecording to the published reports, never denied, were demanding the bounty for this year. There was no thought of yielding to them; even the pledges of the Democratic campaign managers and the Senate caucus did not seem to be powerful in their behalf, while the protection to the Sugar Trust remained as firmly in the bill as though the contract had been made in writing as well as consideration paid in 1892.

The Wilson bill went to the Senate. The duties were raised generally in the Senate. Some 600 amendments were made increasing the duties on various items. The combination that finally voted these amendments into law included the Senators from Louisiana and other sugar-producing States and all the votes that the Sugar Trust could muster. The Wilson bill came back to the House and was concurred in by the House. The only bill that ever passed the House, as far as I have been able to learn, placing sugar on the free list, was the sugar schedule in the Wilson bill as it passed the House in the first instance supported by a unanimous Republican vote. If a Republican protectionist could have voted for free sugar in 1894, why can not a Republican who believes generally in the protective theory vote for it in 1912? If it was good Republican doctrine then it must be good Republican doctrine now. When the Republicans came into power it was necessary again to revise the tariff. It was necessary to raise the rate on wool; people interested in the metal schedule demanded a raise on it; people engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods demanded a raise on cotton, and in order to get the votes from the sugar States and the support of the Sugar Trust Senators, it was necessary to raise the rate on sugar. The friends of free sugar had no opportunity to vote on the sugar schedule as a separate schedule, and I venture the assertion that there would be no chance to place sugar on the free list now if we were taking up the tariff law as a whole. Men who are in favor of free sugar now are given an opportunity to vote their convictions.

All the provisions contained in the Wilson bill as passed and enacted into law which had the effect of firmly establishing and maintaining the sugar monopoly remains in the law at the present time, which this bill proposes to repeal. If Mr. PAYNE was sincere and right in maintaining that the Wilson bill would put the people of the United States in the grasp of the Sugar Trust—and I think he was; the subsequent history has proved that his prophecy was correct—he has the opportunity to assist in undoing the wrong now that was perpetrated then. A vote in favor of the present bill will take us out of the hands of the Sugar Trust monopoly.

Mr. CANNON was of the same opinion. He asserted that if the Wilson bill was enacted that it would further increase the hold of the great Sugar Trust upon the people. He said:

But when you come, gentlemen, and demand not only that you shall be protected, but insist that we shall further sustain this sugar anaconda by a continuance of the present schedule, you ask too much; we draw the line there.

It was most strenously claimed by Mr. PAYNE, Mr. DALZELL, Mr. Dingley, and by every Republican who spoke on the subject in 1894 that to place a tariff on sugar with a preferential rate in favor of refined sugar would put the people of this country at the mercy of the Sugar Trust. The solid Republican vote that succeeded in voting out the preferential as well as the duty on refined sugar voted it out on the theory that to leave it in would be in the interest of the great sugar monopoly. It is claimed now that to repeal the law giving a preferential to refined sugars or to the sugar refinery would be in favor of the great Sugar Trust or monopoly. One of two things is certain, the position taken by the Republican Party in 1894, led by the eminent men above mentioned, was in favor of the Sugar Trust or else the position that is taken now by the majority of the Republican Members is in favor of the Sugar Trust. We can not blow hot and cold on this proposition.

IS THE SUGAR TRUST IN FAVOR OF FREE SUGAR AS PROPOSED BY THE PRESENT BILL?

It is claimed and will be strenuously argued that the Sugar Trust is in favor of free sugar. How anyone who is at all conversant with the situation can seriously contend this is more than I can understand. It is an admitted fact that the Sugar Trust refines 91 per cent of all the raw sugar that is consumed in the United States outside of the sugar that is produced and refined by the beet-sugar industry. The beet-sugar plants refine in every instance their own sugar. Every pound of sugar that is imported from abroad—and it amounts to more than one-half of what we consume—is raw cane sugar. Something over 4,000,000,000 pounds of raw cane sugar are imported into this country annually, and 91 per cent of this enters the back door of the American Sugar Refining Co. to be refined. Our present schedule on sugar makes it utterly impossible to import successfully refined sugar. If we opened the door, as we will by placing sugar on the free list, to importations of refined sugar, their monopoly will be at an end. It is probably true that in that case the sugar-refining company will refine most of the sugar that is consumed, but the refined sugar will be in direct competition then with every sugar refinery in the world. Most of our sugar cane comes from the West Indies. We have a lower freight rate from that point than Europe. It would be impossible for the European refiners of sugar to buy their sugar in the West Indies, transport it to Europe, refine it, and then transport it back and compete with our home factories, but the sugar refiner will be compelled to sell his refined sugar at a price but a trifle above the price of refined sugar in England or Europe. Under the present law the refiner is enabled to charge an exorbitant profit for his refined sugar.

The American Sugar Refining Co. has been able for the last 10 years to purchase its raw sugar at about $2.19 a hundred. The average price at which it has sold it for the same 10 years, at wholesale, New York, is $4.84 a hundred. Most of this raw sugar is bought in Cuba, and the American Sugar Refining Co. has paid on an average about $2.19 for its raw sugar. The tariff on this sugar has been about $1.35 a hundred, so when we add the tariff to the price of the raw product its sugar has cost it about $3.54. If we add 15 cents a hundred, the cost of transporting sugar in cargo from the West Indies, we add a larger price for transportation than it has cost the company. This would make raw sugar cost the American Sugar Refining Co. $3.69 in New York. This company has placed this sugar on the market on an average for 10 years at $4.84 a hundred; or it has charged the difference between $3.69, its cost, and $4.84, its selling price, for refining the same. It has charged for refining and profit for refining, $1.15. If we assume that this is an exorbitant price, as we will readily see if we compare this cost with the cost of refining light sugar in England. Raw cane sugar has cost the refiner in England, on board of ship at the ports of England, for the last 10 years an average of $2.37 a hundred. This was bought in the open market of the world and in competition with the American Sugar Refining Co. in New York. The average price of refined sugar in England for the past 10 years is $2.75 a hundred; or, the English refiner has bought sugar in competition with the American Sugar Refining Co., refined the sugar, and placed it on the market for 38 cents a hundred, as opposed to $1.15 a hundred grabbed by the Sugar Trust by means of our protective tariff. The American Sugar Refining Co. has been able to make a profit under our tariff of 77 cents per hundred more than an Englishman has who has refined the same grade of sugar. We have paid three times as much for the refining of our sugar as the Englishman has paid.

No doubt one or two of the independent sugar-refining companies desire free sugar, but it is utterly absurd to undertake to show that the American Sugar Refining Co., which refines 91 per cent of the raw sugar in this country, desires free sugar. If anything will tend to burst the monopoly they hold on the refining business, it will be free sugar. I am supported in this by very many eminent Republicans who made a very gallant fight for free sugar when the McKinley bill was before the House and likewise when the Wilson bill was before the House; also many prominent Democrats.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York, speaking further on the Wilson law, said:

In addition to this the Senate bill provides that Hawaiian sugar shall be admitted free of duty. The product amounts to 300,000,000 pounds, which would result in a bonanza of $6,000,000 per year to be divided between the Hawaiian planters and the Sugar Trust, which takes the entire production from them.

In order to take away a bounty of $13,000,000 to the sugar planter you vote a bonus of $18,000,000 to the trust on the sugar in sight, one-half a cent per pound differential on the four billions annually consumed, or $20,000,000 per annum, and a further bounty of $6,000,000 per annum on Hawaiian sugar. At the same time you place a grievous tax on every man's breakfast table. Verily, as the President says, "this is a delicate subject."

Continuing, Mr. PAYNE said:

A vote for the restoration of a duty on sugar is a vote of $5,000,000 a year to the gentlemen who own the sugar plantations in the Hawaiian Islands; it is a vote of $10,000,000 a year to those who own the sugar plantations in Louisiana and other plantations in the South and West, and therefore I am opposed to voting that tariff upon sugar. I am opposed to the scheme contained in the present bill of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, because it is simply voting a gratuity to the producers of sugar without any prospect of a public benefit. No man is sanguine enough to hope, or dare express the hope, that the effect of this bounty in this bill will benefit the sugar industry or establish it upon a permanent basis. On the other hand, it will destroy the industry, and that very quickly and simply. The people of the United States are called upon to expend $35,000,000 for a class comprising a few individuals, a small class—legislation for a few people in the United States.

I am in favor of keeping in operation the present law not only because it has been held out to the people who would produce this sugar that they would have this bounty, but because by a similar bounty Germany and France were able to build up the beet-sugar industry, and that we shall be able under it to build up that industry in a few years sufficiently to supply the whole consumption of our own country.

Continuing, Mr. PAYNE said:

The time came for the preparation of a tariff bill. It came to the House from the Ways and Means Committee with a protective duty for the trust and free sugar for the producer. The Democratic House, aided by a solid Republican vote, made sugar free in the bill, and in that form it went to the Senate. Then the State of Louisiana demanded a specific rate of duty. These are the interests to whom the pledges were made—the man who had votes in the Senate.

But the Sugar Trust appeared and demanded an ad valorem rate on both raw and refined sugars, with an additional discriminating duty on the refined. The Secretary of the Treasury drew the sugar schedule, and it is drawn exactly as the trust demanded.

This bill went through the Senate exactly as the trust demanded it. Over six weeks were spent by the Democratic conferees upon this measure and no concession was made as against the Sugar Trust.

During the discussion of the Wilson bill JOSEPH G. CANNON said:

The Republican Party in writing sugar upon the free list also relieved the country from embarrassment under a treaty with the Sandwich Islands which had been running for over 20 years and which permitted the product of those islands to come in free, whereas sugar coming from other countries paid 2 cents a pound, and the fact that the 95 per cent of the other sugar paid 2 cents gave a profit of 2 cents a pound on the Sandwich Island sugar and put into the pockets of Claus Spreckels and other Pacific coast people $5,000,000 a year. The legislation of the Republican Party cut off that tax, not one cent of which has been paid by the people since, and not one cent of which relief the Democracy proposed in 1888 or at any other time to grant to the people.

While an effort was being made in the Senate to put sugar back on a dutiable list in the McKinley bill, Senator Vest, of Missouri, said:

What does this proposed taxation do? It puts $20,000,000 a year into the pockets of this enormous trust and gives them their raw material, the sugars under 13, free. It is done in the interest of the people of this country, and Senators will go upon the hustings and denounce the trusts and combines and declare that they look upon them as accursed things that ought to be wiped out if any legislation can accomplish it—and this in the face of the fact that Mr. Havemeyer says if he gets his raw sugars free he can beat the English refiners.

Congressman Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, speaking of the Wilson bill after it went to conference, said:

When the Wilson bill passed in the House of Representatives the stock of the great Sugar Trust, which has been watered up from nine millions to sixty-odd millions, was worth in the markets of the country 17; to-day it is worth 107; and when this bill goes into effect, and there is no longer any danger of unfriendly legislation, it will doubtless forge even way up to 120. Already you had added to the value of this stock from thirty to thirty-five millions of dollars, and you propose by this bill, in the interest of this trust, as admitted by Mr. Wilson, to take from the people of the United States forty-odd million dollars in sugar taxation and put every cent of it into the pockets of this enormous combination. (Vol. 26, pt. 10, Appendix, pt. 2 (23), p. 1356.)

When the Wilson bill was under consideration Congressman Gear said:

Let me call the attention of the House and the country to the real facts in the case. In the Fifty-first Congress every Democrat, under the lead of Mr. Carlisle, voted against the free-sugar schedule. The House passed the schedule with free sugar up to No. 16. The bill went to the Senate and the Finance Committee of that body reported it back to the Senate with No. 16, which is a good table and culinary sugar, stricken out, and inserted No. 13, which is as black as my coat.

The Senate, under the lead of Senator Carlisle, with the aid of two or three Republican Members, passed the bill in this shape. The bill went to conference. Then, as now, sugar was the pivotal point in the bill. But, Mr. Speaker, the conferees on the part of the House, different from the House conferees on this bill, were patriotic and loyal to the interest of the people. They stood out and caused the Senate to surrender.

Sir, they gained a signal victory; a victory for the people as distinguished as a surrender of the House is to-day disgraceful. Who are the friends of the Sugar Trust? Why, the Democratic Party. Why do I say that? Sir, it is in evidence that Secretary Carlisle, with the consent of the President, practically drew the schedule of this bill we have just passed, a schedule that has put many millions of dollars, as I have shown, into the coffers of the Sugar Trust and given them, by way of differential duties, large profits in addition.

Continuing, Mr. Grosvenor said:

There is not a Democrat of intelligence in the United States who does not to-day blush for his country. There is not a Democrat on this floor who does not know that this schedule was suggested, improved, amended, put into shape, and absolutely dominated by the representatives of the Sugar Trust. It was done in their interest, and out of it they will make a sum of money that is dazzling and bewildering in figures during the current year. It is stated and admitted upon the floor here that, pending this very legislation, they have piled up almost a year's supply of raw sugar in the warehouses of New York. They import it free of duty and will call it, duty added, to the people of the United States, and all this has been made possible by this Democratic administration.

WHAT IT COSTS TO MAINTAIN THE PRODUCTION OF SUGAR IN PORTO RICO, HAWAII, AND THE UNITED STATES.

I think I have demonstrated that we would pay 1.9 cents per pound on sugar that we consume from Hawaii, Cuba, and the Philippines, as well as that produced in the United States, more than we would pay if the proposed bill becomes a law. The Bureau of Statistics informs me that this year our importations from Porto Rico will amount to 689,000,000 pounds. By using a little mathematics we will see that we pay the Porto Ricans a bonus of $12,000,000 annually. This equals $12 for every man, woman, and child in Porto Rico. Porto Rico farmed in 1910 145,000 acres to cane sugar. This bonus or subsidy that we pay them amounts to $80 an acre for every acre of land cultivated to cane sugar. The wages paid in Porto Rico are probably as light as in any place in the world. We do not need a tariff board to inform us that the wage scale in Porto Rico is less than in any country in Continental Europe that produces beet sugar. I venture the assertion that $80 an acre will pay the entire cost of producing cane sugar in Porto Rico and transport it to the city of New York. Why should we tax the man that works in the mines, in the rolling mill, or on the farm for the benefit of the cheap labor of Porto Rico? Last year Hawaii produced 1,110,000,000 pounds of sugar. Our bonus, or tariff, on this amount makes a total of $20,000,000 we paid to the people of Hawaii as a gratuity for raising sugar. The population of Hawaii is 191,000. This amounts to $105 to every, man, woman, and child in Hawaii, or it amounts to $525 for every family.

The labor employed for producing cane sugar is imported coolie labor from Japan and China. Scarcely a penny goes to the employment of native Hawaiians in the raising of sugar; scarcely a penny goes to a man of Anglo-Saxon descent for the raising of cane sugar. The wages paid this coolie labor by the Hawaiian planters average $16 to $20 per month, the laborers boarding themselves. Again, I say we need no tariff board to inform us that the labor cost in Hawaii is no more than it is in Continental Europe. Those $20,000,000 that are taken from the pockets of the American people to pay this gratuity to Hawaii does not go to the labor employed; it does not go to the Hawaiians generally; but it goes to the four or five corporations that own the land in Hawaii that is cultivated to cane sugar and which corporations are said to be very closely allied to the great Sugar Trust, the American Sugar Refining Co. Last year there were 185,000 acres planted to cane sugar in Hawaii. This 1.9 cents bounty per pound we paid on every pound of sugar consumed from Hawaii equals $107 an acre. This $107 an acre will pay for every dollar of expense of raising sugar in Hawaii and transporting it to the refiners in New York, and this $20,000,000 that we give as a gratuity to the sugar planters in Hawaii and the Sugar Trust is wrung in a large measure from the laboring man, the poor man, and the man of ordinary means in America. What is true of Hawaii is true of the Philippine Islands, except that labor is paid even less in the Philippine Islands than it is in Hawaii. It is common knowledge that the wages paid the negroes on Louisiana plantations is the very lightest wage paid in America, and I doubt if it much exceeds the wages paid in Germany and France. The sugar raised in Porto Rico, Hawaii, the Philippine Islands, and in the South amounts to about three-fourths of all the sugar produced in the United States and its island possessions.

A trifle over one-fourth of our sugar is produced from sugar beets. Then only one-fourth of the sugar industry pays anything like American wages. The ordinary acre of sugar beets will produce about 2,400 pounds of sugar to the acre. At $1\frac{7}{8}$ cents per pound we pay $43 an acre for every acre planted to sugar beets in this country. Is there any other branch of our farming that receives such encouragement or one-tenth part of such encouragement? Yet the beet-sugar man, paying the high wages that he pays in America, does not get one-half as many dollars gratuity per acre from the people in this country as the sugar planter in Porto Rico, about 40 per cent as much as the sugar planter in Hawaii, and one-half as much as the planter in the Philippine Islands. We farm the beet sugar in this country on about 440,000 acres. The farmer can not possibly make on an average over $15 an acre profit, so the total profit to the farmer on the beet-sugar industry can not be over $6,500,000. If we follow the arguments of the supporters of our present tariff to its legitimate conclusion, it amounts to this: That it is a wise policy to pay a bonus of $20,000,000 to the Hawaiian Islands, $12,000,000 to Porto Rico, and $9,000,000 to the Philippine Islands in order to give our American sugar-beet farmers $6,000,000 profit. This is only half the story. I have shown that the sugar bill of the United States is $147,000,000 more than it otherwise would be on account of our tariff. If we deduct from this $53,000,000 that the Treasury receives, we compel our people to pay $94,000,000 more for their sugar than necessary, in order that our sugar-beet farmers may get a profit of $6,500,000 for raising sugar beets. I do not know how the recital of these undisputed facts may affect the other Members of the House, but if they are true, and I solemnly assert that they are true, I do not see how any man can see his way clear to vote against this bill. Our tariff on sugar is the most iniquitous, inexcusable thing in our whole tariff bill. There is nothing in the tariff law that calls as loudly for a revision as does the sugar schedule.

WILSON BILL.

The sugar schedule of the Wilson bill as introduced in the House December 19, 1893, was as follows:

Sec. 180. That the bounties authorized to be paid to producers of sugar by section 231 of the act entitled "An act to reduce revenue, equalize duties, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, shall be reduced one-eighth part of their respective amounts as prescribed in said act each year, beginning with July 1, 1895, and extending to July 1, 1901, inclusive, and shall thereafter cease and determine.

Sec. 181. All sugars above No. 16 Dutch standard in color shall pay a duty of five-twentieths of 1 cent per pound.

Sec. 182. Sugar candy and all confectionery made wholly or in part of sugar, and on sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 30 per cent ad valorem; glucose, or grape sugar, 15 per cent ad valorem.

The sugar schedule in the Wilson bill was changed in the House to read as follows:

Sec. 182. That so much of the act entitled "An act to reduce revenue, equalize duties, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, as provides for and authorizes the issue of licenses to produce sugar, and for the payment of a bounty to the producers of sugar from beets, sorghum, or sugar cane grown in the United States, or from maple sap produced within the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, to take effect July 1, 1894, and thereafter it shall be unlawful to issue any license to produce sugar or to pay any bounty for the production of sugar of any kind under the said act.

Sec. 183. Sugar candy and all confectionery made wholly or in part of sugar, and on sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 30 per cent ad valorem; glucose, or grape sugar, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Sugar schedule of the Wilson bill as amended by the Senate, concurred in by the House, and enacted into law:

182. That so much of the act entitled "An act to reduce revenue, equalize duties, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, as provides for and authorizes the issue of licenses to produce sugar, and for the payment of a bounty to the producers of sugar from beets, sorghum, or sugar cane grown in the United States, or from maple sap produced within the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and hereafter it shall be unlawful to issue any license to produce sugar or to pay any bounty for the production of sugar of any kind under the said act.

182½. There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all sugars, and on all tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice or of beet juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem, and upon all sugars above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and upon all sugars which have been discolored there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one-eighth of 1 cent per pound in addition to the said duty of 40 per cent ad valorem, and all sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice or of beet juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete or concentrated molasses which are imported from or are the product of any country which at the time the same are exported therefrom pays, directly or indirectly, a bounty on the export thereof shall pay a duty of one-tenth of 1 cent per pound in addition to the foregoing rates: Provided, That the importer of sugar produced in a foreign country the Government of which grants such direct or indirect bounties may be relieved from this additional duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe in case said importer produces a certificate of said Government that no indirect bounty has been received upon said sugar in excess of the tax collected upon the beet or cane from which it was produced and that no direct bounty has been or shall be paid: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands on the 30th day of January, 1875, or the provisions of any act of Congress heretofore passed for the execution of the same. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on molasses testing above 40 degrees and not above 56 degrees polariscope a duty of 2 cents per gallon; if testing above 56 degrees polariscope, a duty of 4 cents per gallon.

183. Sugar candy and all confectionery, made wholly or in part of sugar, and on sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 35 per cent ad valorem; glucose, or grape sugar, 15 per cent ad valorem; saccharine, 25 per cent ad valorem.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WARBURTON. As I proposed this bill originally, I ask permission to consume 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to object to extending the gentleman's time, but if one gentleman's time is extended, another one's will have to be, and, in order that each Member may have a chance under the five-minute rule, I must insist on the speeches being limited to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. WARBURTON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I made a statement yesterday that, so far as I am concerned, read the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] out of the Republican Party, and this morning he has certified to that statement. I am opposed to the amendment, and I am opposed to any reduction of the duty on sugar that will not furnish adequate protection between the cost of production of sugar in this country and abroad.

Yesterday the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated that the evidence before the sugar investigating committee showed that the cost of beets in this country was less than that paid by the factories in Germany. I think that is a correct statement of the gentleman's remarks. I have here the record to show the testimony before that committee, taken from a record furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, giving the cost price paid by the factories in France for beets for eight years to be $4.05 per ton.

Mr. HARDWICK. What years were those?

Mr. FORDNEY. The years 1902–3, 1903–4, and the five succeeding years; and for the last seven years in Germany the price has been $4.45 a ton.

The records show the price paid by the factories in this country to be far above that, and in the State of Michigan last year $6.91 per ton was paid; but the main point is this: The chairman of the committee stated that the purity of sugar in the foreign beet is of less degree than in the beet in this country. It is just to the contrary, as testified to and as shown in the record that I have before me.

Here is the evidence furnished by the official statistics obtained from the Bureau of Statistics, which obtained them from the bureaus of statistics in France and Germany. Mr. Willett testified, and I have a letter and a telegram from him certifying to the statement made by him, that beets in Germany testing 17½ per cent, as compared with beets of the same test in this country, produced from 1 to 2 per cent more sugar than the beets raised in this country. Let me tell you what that means. The difference between 1 and 2 per cent, say an average of 1½ per cent, means 30 pounds of sugar more per ton extracted from the beets in Germany and France having the same percentage of test than in this country. Thirty pounds of sugar per ton, at 3 cents per pound, means 90 cents per ton more value to the product of the factories in France and Germany for beets of the same percentage or test. Or, put in another way, it means that a 17½ per cent beet in Germany or France produces 30 to 40 pounds more sugar per ton than does the 17½ per cent beet of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill which places sugar on the free list. I regard it as the most important measure that has come before the House during the present session. Its enactment into law will reduce the cost of sugar about 1½ cents per pound, and by far the greater part of the saving of more than $100,000,000 will come to those who most need it—the plain people.

It is inequitable that the millionaire or the multimillionaire, with all his comforts and luxuries, should pay only about the same amount of taxes on his requirements in sugar as does the laborer or the artisan, whose scanty wage is often insufficient to enable him to make ends meet in the ever-increasing struggle for existence. It is unreasonable to hold that the man with a very large income should not pay a larger share of the cost of government than the man with a very small income.

The good people of my district with few exceptions and with no regard to political affiliations—for I am striving to represent all of them—demand free sugar and a fairer distribution of the burden of taxation incident to the cost of maintaining the Government. Most people feel keenly the high cost of living. Those who never experience its pinch should be willing, nay, should be glad, to assist in relieving some of the pressure from those who can ill afford to bear it. And because the industrious and intelligent people of my district demand it, I would support this measure regardless of my own opinion in the matter.

It is not so much my purpose to dwell on the merits of the pending bill as it is to touch briefly on the position of a Member of this House with reference to the views of his constituents. I contend that a Representative should reflect as far as possible the wishes of those who selected him as their Representative. [Applause.]

In thus stating my position I feel, Mr. Chairman, that I am on what some regard as dangerous ground. I know that this is regarded as positively heretical by a certain class of statesman whose reputation as champions of big business, vested interests, and corporate control is nation wide. I have already "suffered the slings and arrows" of one of the mighty warriors of standpatism in the person of Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, former Secretary of the Treasury and now titular head of sundry financial schemes. In an address before the Jewelers' Club of Philadelphia, on Saturday evening, February 26 of this year, Mr. Shaw made this remarkable statement:

> Our Representatives are supposed to be more intelligent and better in every way than the average voter. That is why they are Representatives. Never has there been such a cowardly body of men in Congress as there is to-day. A Member from this city recently read a telegram from a Kensington workingman asking him to vote against a certain measure. He said, "I will vote 'no' because of what this constituent requests." Such a Congressman is worth only as much as that workman. He is only a $1.50 per day man.

And one Philadelphia newspaper that reported Mr. Shaw's speech added:

> It was generally understood that this shot was aimed at Congressman DONOHOE, who represents the Kensington district.

Of course Mr. Shaw, former Secretary of the Treasury, is entitled to his opinions as to the value of a Representative and the cowardice of the present-day Members of Congress; but when he gives voice to those opinions in after-dinner speeches even he is liable to be questioned as to their accuracy and the motives that prompted them.

As to my action in this House, on which the learned gentleman bases his estimate of my worth as a Representative, I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 3, 1911, page 3673, a few remarks which I made on the cotton bill (H. R. 12812) then under discussion:

> Mr. Chairman, before this bill came before the House for consideration I felt that the conditions in my district, as well as the pledges which I had made in my campaign, justified my being in a position to vote for or against it according as my constituents might desire, and therefore I took steps to exempt myself from caucus action.
> In the six congressional districts comprising the city of Philadelphia we have upward of 200 cotton mills, one-half of which I understand are in my district. In order to test the sentiment of those most interested and best informed in the textile industry, I sent the following letter to a gentleman whom I have known for many years as an honest labor leader and one of the most active in promoting the well-being of his fellow workers:
> "Inclosed please find copy of the Underwood cotton bill, which is now before the House. I wish you would have a talk with a number of your friends—both manufacturers and workers—as early as possible and advise me as to how they regard the proposed measure. In such matters I feel that as their Representative in Congress I should be governed by the wishes of the people, and so if those who know the textile business better than I do declare that the bill would be injurious to the textile industries, I will not only vote against it but, regardless of my personal opinion, do whatever is in my power in opposition to its passage."
> In answer to that letter I received this morning a telegram which reads: "Vote for Underwood bill; instructions from Upholstery Weavers, No. 25."
> Having received this request from faithful representatives of the operatives in the cotton mills of my district, and having received no contrary word from anyone in that district, I will gladly vote in favor of the bill.

This, then, was "the head and front of my offending." I requested an intelligent American mechanic to consult his friends, "both manufacturers and workers," and to advise me as to their wishes regarding a pending measure which I felt was of interest to them. Had the telegram brought me the request to vote against the bill I would have done so. Would this have been unsatisfactory to Mr. Shaw?

Former Secretary Shaw may be right when he says that the Congressman who accepts the opinion of a workingman is worth only $1.50 per day. Is that Mr. Shaw's estimate of the value of a skilled mechanic in the textile industry in Kensington? If so, I want to say here and now, and with all the earnestness of which I am capable, that such is not my estimate of the value of any skilled mechanic or any workingman in my district. I know that during the past three or four years the mill operatives have not made full time, and that they have not had even moderate incomes; but I will say to-day, what I said before I was elected a Member of this House, that if my wish could accomplish it there would not be an idle mill nor an idle man in all that great industrial center, and that my earnest hope is that I may be able to render such service here as will tend to lighten the burden and better the lot of every worker everywhere. [Applause.]

But Mr. Shaw knows nothing about Kensington workingmen. He certainly knows nothing about the man to whom he referred in his recent address. I admit—and I am not ashamed to say it—that many operatives in the textile mills know more about the textile industry than I do. And the same holds good in other lines of industry as well. And why not? An intelligent mechanic who has spent 10 or 15 years in his trade, who has made a life study of conditions affecting it, and who depends upon it for his livelihood, should, and, as a matter of fact, does, know more about it in all its phases than even the average high-toned, glib-tongued, after-dinner doctrinaire. And whatever be the shortcomings or limitations of such mechanic few will deny that he is more vitally interested in the prosperity and general betterment of his particular industry than the man who estimates the value of his services at $1.50 per day.

As a striking illustration of his concern for the American workingman, and for the legitimate manufacturer, I quote from a recent prospectus of the American Fiber Reed Co., of which Mr. Shaw is, or was until recently, chairman of the board of directors:

> The American Fiber Reed Co. manufactures fiber and reed furniture with prison labor. Its factories are located inside prison walls and it has at the present time 800 prisoners under contract in Maine, Illinois, and Kentucky. * * * Prison contracts are usually made for eight years and generally continue indefinitely. * * * This company pays for its labor 52 cents per man per day; its competitors, who employ free labor, pay an average wage of about $2 per day. * * * There are no strikes or labor troubles in prisons. * * * These are ideal conditions for profitable manufacturing.

Those whose chief interest is in the great combinations of capital have little concern for the plain people. Everything, it seems, must give way to that which best insures big dividends, and, hence, those vast aggregations of capital whose baneful influence on our industrial life is felt at every turn. The independent manufacturer, squeezed for higher prices of trust-controlled raw materials, finds it more and more difficult to meet competition, and yet has no redress. The mills that form part of the consolidation of interests are operated or closed as the new policy may warrant without consideration for the employees or the people of the locality in which those mills are located. In this way the normal trade of districts is subject to fluctuations and contingencies that, year after year, make it more difficult for the local storekeeper to exist. And thus are the independent manufacturer, the dealer, the mechanic, and the laborer all hurt in turn by the system of which vast wealth is the center and inordinate greed the cohesive force.

While such men are ever alert to the needs of timid capital their chief concern about labor appears to be in seeing that it shall not be overpaid at the expense of big dividends and that those who consult intelligent mechanics on matters of legislation shall be branded as cheap Representatives. And yet these, or such as these, are the ones who will appear on the stump next fall professing their deep interest in and trying to fool again those whose votes they need to continue and, if possible, increase the sway of the system.

I would ask, in passing, what per diem value Mr. Shaw would place on the Congressman who would consult on matters of moment such great financiers as himself or Mr. Morgan or Mr. Rockefeller? Would he be worth, say, a million dollars per month, which is said to be the income of some of these worthy men?

Never—

> has there been such a cowardly body of men in Congress as there is to-day.

And Mr. Shaw finds proof sufficient for himself in the fact that some of the Members of this body have fallen so low as to accept suggestions from American mechanics. It would seem as if Mr. Shaw's lofty idea of courageous statesmanship is personified in the Congressman who, not deigning to listen to a representative of the toiling masses, takes his orders from a big political boss or a corrupt machine whose power is founded on intimidation, bribery, and other forms of election fraud.

In spite of a powerful machine the intelligent people of my district sent me here, and until those people change their mind they will be represented in Congress by one who will be glad to consult them on matters of legislation affecting their material interests. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, once more our Democratic friends, being clothed with authority in the House of Representatives, are bent upon favoring foreign capital, foreign labor, and the foreign farmer to the injury of American capital, American labor, and the American farmer, as is clearly shown by this bill placing sugar on the free list.

I do not favor this bill, and such is the attitude of Republicans generally, and this feeling is shared by many Democrats, and the method of its creation is also criticized, as is shown by the statement of Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, in the Washington Post, of March 1:

"Representative BROUSSARD, of Louisiana, after attempting to find out directly from Mr. UNDERWOOD what the report would be, issued a statement attacking the Ways and Means Committee for the secrecy.

"'The secret caucus—the dark-room operations—the blindman's buff method of legislation,' said Representative BROUSSARD, 'will not answer modern thought on matters affecting the public welfare. I fail to see the force of this. If a man is doing a right thing he should invite criticism. This is legislation by caucus, with every Member blindfolded. I informed Mr. UNDERWOOD that that system of legislating would not do. I, for one, will not stand for it. The people of the country have a right to know what is going on here.'"

This able and distinguished Democrat has been elected to the House of Representatives eight times, and at the coming session of the general assembly of his State he will be elected to the Senate for six years, beginning March 4, 1915.

Mr. BROUSSARD is correct. During this Congress, so far, our opponents have been legislating by caucus; so much so that many of their Members are bound to such an extent by the caucus that they dare not express their own views upon many questions affecting the public welfare.

Is there any wonder that only 5 hours and 40 minutes general debate was allowed on this bill; one of the most important that will be introduced in this Congress, of which the Republicans had only 2 hours and 20 minutes; a bill which will cause a loss of revenue annually in round numbers of $55,000,000 and a loss of practically $10,000,000 for every hour of general discussion.

It seems a shame that any party should feel called upon to legislate so as to destroy the leading industry and one which for years has been encouraged both by the Republican and Democratic Parties, in a State in which there is invested in round numbers $120,000,000, producing an annual crop worth approximately $30,000,000 and employing 60,000 laborers, but the Democratic Party is repeating, in part, the legislation which brought about the dreadful conditions from 1893 to 1897. To be consistent they should put wool on the free list, but they dare not do it, fearing the further wrath and indignation of the farmer.

ALWAYS A SUGAR DUTY.

The first tariff bill, before sugar was ever made in this country, levied a sugar duty, and in all recent years has furnished millions of revenue, varying from fifty millions or more, toward the support of the Government. What a contrast this Democratic House presents as to sugar as compared to every other Congress since the foundation of the Government, ever bearing in mind that the Government has been levying duties on sugar for 123 years.

At a great mass meeting held in New Orleans March 12 the attempt of the committee to place sugar on the free list was severely denounced. The meeting was composed of men of all political parties—Republicans and Democrats, laborers, sugar planters, and men engaged in the manufacture of sugar machinery. It was a notable gathering of the financial, business, professional, political, and laboring interests of the State. It was shown at this meeting that the destruction of the sugar industry would involve a loss of 1,000,000 tons, worth $100,000,000, annually to the world's supply, and as a result necessitate the importation of additional sugars into the United States, and that ultimately the price of sugar would be raised to increase the profits of the refiners, and as a further result it must be evident that when the refiners, only six in number, are able to control the market the consumer will not be benefited, as the claim is made by many, but, upon the contrary, the price to the consumer will be increased.

At this meeting Mr. H. N. Pharr, one of the leading sugar men of the State, is quoted in the Daily Picayune of March 13 as saying:

"History is about to repeat itself in the sugar industry. In 1894 there assembled in New Orleans a convention of a large and representative body of citizens of Louisiana interested in the welfare of the sugar industry. There had been an upheaval of parties, and that party to which Louisiana had always yielded allegiance had been intrusted with the affairs of the Government. There was agitation for tariff reduction, and sugar was made the target. The bounty on sugar that had been established was considered by Louisiana and the beet-sugar people binding as a contract at least for 15 years. The industry in Louisiana had nearly doubled in the time that the bounty had been in force, but the bounty was annulled and a tariff of 40 per cent placed on sugar. The convention in this city protested against that action. There were many present who are here now, and they remember of scenes and the gloomy conditions that succeeded the passage of the Wilson bill. Thousands of tons of cane were left in the fields because it did not pay to handle it, and many mills were closed, never to open again; properties changed hands or were mortgaged.

"There was political confusion and chaos in the State. Lifelong connections were severed, and there came near being fraternal strife, and the State was shaken to the center.

"After 18 years we meet again to oppose an act which, if passed and allowed to become a law, will cause the conditions of 1896 to pale in importance. Sugar is to be placed on the free list by that act. It seems especially unfortunate that men of our neighboring States lead in the movement—UNDERWOOD of Alabama and HARDWICK of Georgia."

Mr. Pharr said that he did not speak as a politicial partisan, and those who remembered him in the place he occupied as a man without party would not accuse him of it. He said that the act was neither Democratic nor protectionist and sacrificed the domestic sugar industry ostensibly for the benefit of the laborer but really for the American Sugar Refining Co., which would get the most benefit. He said that, laying aside tariff features, he believed that the majority of the American people would agreet that the committee at Washington had shown a lack of statesmanship in destroying an industry in which $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 is invested.

It was being condemned by the press all over the country and should be denounced as buncombe of the most detestable kind, as the Democrats advocating it expect the President to veto the bill and are merely doing it for political capital.

If the Government for years fosters an industry and then at once withdraws its support, the rankest free trader would recoil from such vandalism. The speaker said he thought that Cox's army marching on Washington and the financial depression of those times would not be forgotten, but the present committee in its egotism has forgotten it.

Mr. Pharr said that the Underwood bill, if it did all that it was claimed it could, would do it at a dreadful price to Louisiana, Texas, and the West. It would result in destroying $50,000,000 of interstate trade, $100,000,000 of foreign trade, take away $53,000,000 of internal revenue, and, worst of all, would compel the Nation to depend on foreign nations for sugar in peace and war, and would perpetuate monopoly and enable the Sugar Trust to fix prices as it pleased. How any sane man, seeing the two sides of the ledger, could strike a balance for free trade I can not understand.

The only argument is the cost to the wage earner. That reduction would be temporary—only long enough to destroy the local sugar industry—and then the prices would resume their level or go higher. The result to the wage earner would be negligible, and what would free sugar mean to Louisiana? It would mean that 30,000 wage earners and 150,000 other people would be out of work, and the loss in the beet country in the West would be greater. The loss of employment would more than double this in the grinding season, and a half million people in New Orleans and Louisiana would be seriously crippled and many bankrupted. A million acres of land would be placed on the market and break down prices. It would stop reclamation and stop the large immigration that is coming into the State. The financial panic would cause others to pale into insignificance. It would result in reducing population and setting back the progress of the State 25 years.

What is taken for the cultivation of the soil, for machinery, and factory supplies from the other parts of the country would be wiped out, and the farms would have to be planted in cotton, corn, hay, truck, and so forth, to compete with the overstocked market.

Every man, woman, and child in south Louisiana would be seriously affected and almost every important industry in the United States would suffer. Every intelligent man knows that it is absurd to say that free sugar will not destroy the manufacture of sugar in Louisiana.

They claim that it will reduce the price 1½ cents, and we know that the refiner and grocer will have their profit, and with 4 cents as the price for the last 10 years, taking off 1½, it will leave 2½, or a reduction of not less than 1 to 1½ cents in Louisiana. The result is so simple that I marvel that an intelligent man could sign such a document.

Mr. Parr said he wished to emphasize, what was admitted, that the sugar ringers had spent $12,000 creating sentiment for free sugar; they wish to crush domestic sugar, as it is a dangerous competitor, and its destruction would enable the trust to increase on its investment.

Mr. R. E. Lee, former labor commissioner of Louisiana, is quoted in the same paper as saying that he spoke from the standpoint of a laboring man solely and only. He said as a workingman to workingmen, that they do not object to being legislated out of a political job, but that they do object to being legislated out of a living.

If this free-trade bill passes, said Mr. Lee, I say that every workingman will be reduced to the point of starvation within two weeks after it becomes a law.

He declared that free trade in operation means rust and decay, and that honest protection means prosperity and happiness.

If they want to establish free trade, why do not they tear down the immigration laws, queried Mr. Lee, and let the cheap labor come in with the free goods?

IMMIGRATION AND PROTECTION LAWS GO HAND IN HAND.

He referred to the Mills bill under the first administration of President Cleveland, and said that under the bill he had his first experience with free trade. He said he walked the streets of New Orleans for six months without a job, and that the people who know him know that he is a skillful mechanic. He pointed out that under the operation of the Wilson bill there were millions of unemployed, and that this country can not live under free trade.

FIVE HUNDRED YEARS OF PROTECTION IN ENGLAND.

When they try to foist a free-trade bill in this country, said Mr. Lee, let them remember that England gave 500 years of protection before the free-trade laws of that nation were enacted. He pointed out that the average industry in America is but 66 years old, and that even now prominent English statesmen are advocating a protective policy for England for the betterment of the laboring classes of the country.

FREE SUGAR AND RAW MATERIAL MEAN UTTER DAMNATION IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. James W. Porch is quoted in the same paper as saying, "Free sugar and raw material mean utter damnation," and explained how jute bagging was saved by President Taft vetoing the bill that had passed both Houses. I tell you this is un-American and against our institutions—something we can not tolerate, nor will we stand it. He showed the error of trying to put the United States on the level with the Mexicans and advocating keeping up conditions in this country. The reason why the United States surpasses other countries is that it has protected its industries and believes in the intelligent masses and not the intelligent few. There is no country that has felt direct taxation less than here, and there is no more ideal way of getting revenue than by the slight tax on sugar. He spoke of the enrichment of the refineries that would follow and of the fight of the people to save themselves from the legislators. The country is not in a position to experiment.

The foreign steamship agents would control the importation of sugar and would send it when they chose, and the refineries would own ships and manipulate the trade as they chose.

The business could be so developed here that the country could export sugar. Mr. Porch said it was reported that UNDERWOOD wanted to make Birmingham the steel center of the world. God save us from such statesmen.

He said that the saving feature was that there was a sane man in the President's chair who will put across the bill the stamp of disapproval, as he saved the jute industry.

Other distinguished and eloquent men addressed the meeting, and all condemned in severe terms the placing of sugar on the free list.

While those engaged in the sugar business are familiar with the following facts, the general public are not. The present rates of duty are, viz:

On refined sugar, $1.90 per 100 pounds.
On raw sugar of 96°, $1.68½ per 100 pounds.
On raw sugar from Cuba (20 per cent less), $1.35 per 100 pounds.

Refined sugar is not imported.

The world's production and consumption of sugar are about 16,000,000 tons, nearly evenly balanced, as you will see.

The annual consumption in the United States is 3,500,000 tons, derived from the following sources:

	Tons.
Raw cane, duty paying, chiefly from Cuba	1,800,000
Raw cane, domestic, from Porto Rico	300,000
Raw cane, domestic, from Louisiana	300,000
Raw cane, domestic, Hawaiian Islands	500,000
Total cane sugar	2,900,000
Beet sugar produced in the United States	600,000
Total	3,500,000

From the above figures you will see that about one-half of the consumption is produced in the United States and her colonies, but Porto Rico, Louisiana, and the Hawaiian Islands have practically reached the limit of their productive capacity, but not so in the United States, for there is a great undeveloped acreage that can be utilized for the raising of sugar beets sufficient to supply every pound of sugar that can be consumed in the United States, and I believe we can yet export sugar with a profit even after reducing the present price to the consumer, and, in a word, this is to be done by the expansion of the sugar-beet industry, but it can not and will not be done so long as our Democratic opponents insist upon tinkering with the tariff.

What we must try to do, and will do, is to produce the 1,800,000 tons of sugar which are now purchased in foreign countries and enough more for our increasing population.

The output of beet sugar in the United States in 1890 was 2,203 tons. In 1897 it was 45,000 tons, and in 1911, 600,000 tons, which is about one-sixth of the Nation's consumption—3,500,000 tons.

Who is there beside our Democratic opponents that wants to destroy the cane and sugar-beet industry in the United States? I will tell you. The refiners of sugar, six in number, located at New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, San Francisco, and New Orleans. And why do they want to destroy the sugar-beet industry? Because the refiners import the raw sugar and refine it and want to control the whole, not a part, of the splendid sugar market of the United States, for we are the greatest sugar-consuming country in the world, using about one-fifth of the world's entire output of sugar.

They raise sugar beets in Germany and other countries in Europe. The reports from the Department of Agriculture in Washington will convince anyone that the soil and climatic conditions necessary to the production of beet sugar in the United States are equal to the best districts in Europe.

I read an article a short time ago to the effect that the reports from the Department of Agriculture show that there is enough land in the United States adapted to beet culture to produce as much sugar in one year as the entire world has consumed since the birth of Christ. I believe this is so, for I believe that we are just beginning to learn about the raising of sugar beets and the lands that are adapted to the same. Where are these lands referred to? They are located in Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Colorado, Utah, California, and other States, 16 in all, that we know about. I believe that in the State of Michigan alone we have available sugar-beet lands sufficient to raise every pound of sugar that is consumed in the United States. The honorable Secretary of Agriculture, James Wilson, has said more than once that there were sufficient lands for this purpose in Iowa and that the farmer ought to raise double the tons per acre that he is now doing, and no doubt as he becomes more familiar and understands better about the production of sugar beets that such will be the case.

I was agreeably pleased and astonished to be told a short time ago by Mr. George McCormick, superintendent of the sugar-beet factory at Menominee, Mich., that the best sugar beets in this country were raised in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, and that if one-half of the available sugar-beet lands in the upper peninsular could be used for raising beets it would supply all the sugar each year that is needed in this country. What a field for sugar-beet factories!

The truth of this fact is further apparent when we consider that the amount of land devoted to beets in Germany any one year is only 10 per cent greater than the area of my own county—Oakland, in the State of Michigan—and that Germany on such an area produces in any one year two-thirds as much sugar as the United States consumes.

At a recent interview which I had with Dr. Orr, of the Agricultural Department, who spent last summer in the sugar-beet fields of Germany, he told me that the German farmer did not raise sugar beets so much for the profits from the beets as to improve and prepare the soil for the crops which were to follow. That is not the rule in this country at this time, so far as I am acquainted; but, on the other hand, the farmer is raising beets primarily for the profit which is in the beets, and the preparation of the soil for the coming crop is secondary.

We must bear in mind that although the sugar-beet industry is yet an infant one in this country, thousands of people who have been trained in the beet fields of Europe have come to this country to make a home. Many of them have settled in the city. Many of them gladly avail themselves of the opportunity to go into our beet fields and have proven the most valuable help that the farmers can get in raising beets, and in many cases have been able to secure these laborers for the balance of the year in doing other work upon the farm. In these days when there are so many abandoned farms, largely because the farmer is unable to secure the necessary help, is it not better to encourage these people to become tillers of the soil, either as laborers for others or in their own right as owners of farms, rather than to remain in congested centers of population?

WAGES.

I want to call your attention to the matter of wages. "The lowest wages paid in the beet-sugar factories of the United States for common laborers, such as sweepers, loaders, and so forth, is $2.10 per day. The average rate of wages in these American factories is between $2.40 and $2.50 per day. In other words, the wage rate in the American beet-sugar factories is more than three times as great as in the European beet-sugar factories.

In a word, it will be readily seen that we have not only the proper soil and climatic conditions for producing our own sugar, but we have the workmen skilled in raising the beets and an abundance of capital right at home to build the necessary factories for producing all the sugar that can be consumed in this country, and I again want to assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that by reasonable encouragement the price of sugar can be reduced to the consumer and the United States become an exporter of the same.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Now, "the necessity for a protective tariff to build up the domestic beet-sugar industry is apparent from the fact that the Michigan manufacturer of sugar pays the farmer 2½ cents per pound for all the sugar he is able to extract from the beets delivered by the farmer to the factory; that is, when the farmer delivers his beets to the factory he receives for them the equivalent of 2½ cents for each pound of sugar the factory is able to extract from those beets."

This is more than the average price of the European raw sugar laid down in bond in New York for the 10 years preceding January 1, 1911.

Now, again, "if the American manufacturer of beet sugar is to compete with European sugar without the protection of the tariff, it must be apparent that the farmer must sell his beets at not to exceed two-thirds the price he now receives for them, and the workmen in the factories must work for European wages.

"In Michigan alone there are now 30,000 farmers raising beets for the 17 factories in this State. It is needless to say that they will not raise these beets unless they can make money in so doing. It is true that they can turn their attention to some other lines of agriculture less profitable to them than the present beet crop, but the farmer is constantly being urged to diversify his crop.

"Such being the case, the beet-sugar factories would have nothing to do, and the investors in those factories would lose the $70,000,000 now invested in the sugar-beet factories of the United States. This fact accounts for the manufacturer's interest in the tariff on sugar.

"There are in the United States 71 sugar-beet factories, producing in round numbers 600,000 tons of beet sugar per year, or, practically speaking, about one-fifth of all the sugar consumed in the United States."

Those who are familiar with the development of the sugar-beet industry in Michigan know that as a result of the establishment of this industry farm values have increased in the beet-sugar districts manyfold. I am able to speak advisedly when I say that I know that lands which I could have purchased 16 years ago in Huron County, Mich., for $10 per acre are now selling for from $100 to $125 and $150 per acre, and those who pay these prices are reaping a fine reward for their investment in using these lands for the raising of sugar beets.

The fertility of the soil is being improved, and the farmer is raising better crops of all kinds than before this industry was established. Farm buildings are being improved and many new ones built. In the last two campaigns throughout my district it was a matter of daily comment that so many new, large red barns were being built, owing to the prosperous condition of the farmer. Farm mortgages are being paid, and in the sugar-beet district, where the industry has been carried on, it is the exception to find a farmer with a mortgage on his farm, and it is becoming the exception to find the farmer who is extensively engaged in the sugar-beet industry not to find him owning at least one automobile, or abundantly able to do so if he desired. In a word, a general air of prosperity exists from the fact that the farmers are being paid by the Michigan factories in Michigan $8,000,000 annually or more for their beets.

FOUR HUNDRED BEET-SUGAR FACTORIES.

To produce in this country all the sugar that is needed would mean the erection of at least 400 beet-sugar factories in the Eastern, Central, Southern, and Western States, requiring an outlay of $400,000,000.

If this industry can be properly encouraged, the interior of the country would be improved as conditions have improved in Michigan, and the beneficent blessings of the industry would be distributed throughout the whole country.

If it were not for the present agitation to put sugar on the free list, I am informed that this year there would have been eight more beet-sugar factories built east and nine west of the Mississippi River.

Our Democratic opponents are forever talking about destroying the trusts. I want to suggest, first, that it would be better to regulate them, but if they sincerely desire to destroy the Sugar Trust, let them join with the Republicans in encouraging the building of a sugar mill in every congressional district throughout the Union, wherever there are sufficient lands to warrant the building of a mill to manufacture either cane or beet sugar, and the Sugar Trust will be a thing of the past.

Destroy the cane and beet sugar industries in this country and how easy it will be for the six refineries to combine and control the price of sugar, and who is there so dense that can not see it?

Let me plead with you Democrats that you do not persist in destroying the cane-sugar industry in Louisiana and Texas and the beet-sugar industry in Michigan and other States. We have 17 factories in Michigan, built at a cost of many millions of dollars, and more will be built if the industry can be encouraged. It affords employment for many laborers in the field and in the factory at splendid wages. More than 30,000 farmers in Michigan are engaged in raising sugar beets, and they have expended many thousands of dollars in purchasing machinery adapted to this work, which would be practically of no value for any other purpose. Why not by your legislation seem to appreciate the needs of this country, and by so doing encourage as rapidly as possible the building of enough sugar factories to produce not only all the sugar that we consume in this country, but let us as we can become exporters of the same?

FREE SUGAR V. FREE WOOL.

Of course you will be consistent and put wool on the free list, as you have sugar. At the extraordinary session of this Congress you advocated a duty on wool for revenue purposes only. Wool produces, in round numbers, an annual revenue of $21,000,000; sugar fifty-odd millions. You have sought to make up the deficiency in the case of sugar by an income tax. By the same course of reasoning, why not increase the income tax and make up for the $21,000,000 to be lost on wool? When the campaign is on, you will be telling the voter how necessary it is for him to have cheap blankets and cheap winter clothing. Now is your opportunity to practice what you preach and give it to him. Free sugar and free wool go hand in hand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to members of the committee that I have come to an understanding with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that we will agree to a general leave to print when we get back into the House. It will be unnecessary to ask for any extension of time, as when we get back in the House I will ask for general leave to print for five legislative days.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, California, Colorado, and Michigan are neck and neck in the race for first place in the beet-sugar production of the United States.

In my own district many farmers are engaged in raising beets for the factory located at Blissfield, in Lenawee County, one of the greatest agricultural counties in the entire country, as well as for other factories within Michigan, among them those of Lansing, Owosso, and Mount Clemens, and also for those Ohio factories just over the line in Ohio at Fremont, Paulding, and Toledo.

The beet-sugar business gives employment to many men in my own district and State. It is estimated that 34,000 Michigan farmers raise sugar beets, about 2,000 for every factory. Sugar-beet raising has increased the value of much farm land, not only in counties of my own district but throughout the State, and has come to be an important business in Michigan. Then, too, the 17 Michigan factories employ an average of 350 men each during the active season.

So much for the producer and manufacturer.

Now, as to the consumer. When sugar was especially high last summer it was the domestic crop, the beet-sugar crop, that reduced the price about 2 cents a pound. In fact, this domestic beet-sugar production, being all refined sugar, furnishes the only competition to the output of the refiners themselves. Without the beet-sugar competition the people have absolutely no shield against the refiners' monopoly.

In view of the advantage, then, of beet-sugar production to the consumer as well as to the producer, I am utterly at a loss to understand this proposed legislation. And when I look over the history of the country in this regard, I am still more at a loss.

The first Congress that met under the Constitution in 1789 placed a duty on sugar. If at any time since then sugar has been on the free list, a careful search of the statutes has failed to reveal the fact to me. The nearest approach to free sugar was under the McKinley bill, when refined sugar paid a duty of half a cent per pound, and the interest of the domestic producers—at that time almost exclusively located in Louisiana—was guarded by a bounty of 2 cents per pound. The Walker tariff of 1846, always pointed to as the model Democratic tariff, placed a 30 per cent ad valorem duty on sugar, while the Wilson bill of 1894 made the ad valorem rate 40 per cent.

Nor is the United States alone in adopting this policy. Every civilized nation in the world maintains a duty on sugar. Even free-trade England, which does not produce a pound of sugar, places a duty of about 40 cents per hundred pounds on this commodity. The great sugar-producing countries in Europe maintain a higher duty on sugar than does the United States. Every important beet-sugar producing country in the world has a higher rate of duty on sugar than we now have.

Why this reversal of a governmental policy we have followed for over a hundred years? Why this abandonment of the precedent established by the civilized world? Is the wisdom of the gentlemen constituting the present Ways and Means Committee greater than that of all the Ways and Means Committees that have preceded them? Will you, on the other side of this Chamber, disregard the advice of such Democrats as Alexander J. Dallas, Daniel Manning, and John G. Carlisle in order that you may sit at the feet of the gentlemen who have framed this new fiscal policy? Is your wisdom so keen, your acumen so sure, your wisdom so profound that you can build more surely the foundation of national prosperity than did Bismarck, for example, who, by high tariff legislation, built up the great beet-sugar industry in Germany under natural conditions not anywhere near as favorable as those in this country?

No! The answer is not here. To such claims you make no pretense. You have not the slightest expectation that this bill will ever become a law. No responsibility attaches to the introduction of this measure. If such responsibility did follow, this measure would probably not be here. Even as it is, the opposition to it, down in the hearts of many of the Members on the other side, is so bitter that I have no doubt enough would gladly break away to defeat it if it were not for the lash of the party caucus. If you really thought this would become a law, you would not lightly wipe out $53,000,000 of sure revenue with the probability, nay, the moral certainty, that very little, if any, ultimately, of the remitted duty will go to the benefit of the consumer.

The real reason why this free-sugar bill has been brought forth is the fact that a general election is to be held next November.

"Free sugar" is to be a campaign watchword. It is to be used in loud grand-stand oratory about lowering the cost of living. I freely admit that for a time, until effective competition is destroyed, the refiners might possibly, for their own selfish purposes, make a temporary reduction in the cost of sugar, only to recoup many times over as soon as they have secured control of the market. In the end there will be no reduction whatever—simply the destruction of a great industry giving employment to tens of thousands of men all over the country. With beet sugar removed as a competitor the refiners would have the field to themselves. The beet-sugar industry once destroyed is not easily revived, because of the length of time it takes to raise a crop and manufacture sugar.

For six months a congressional committee has been investigating the sugar industry of the United States. Three weeks ago they submitted a unanimous report to the House wherein they find that there is a Sugar Trust, against which they lay 21 distinct counts for violations of the laws of the land, and for these violations the Government is now seeking to dissolve that trust.

An analysis of the Hardwick committee report, on pages 14 and 15, discloses the fact that only about 12 per cent of the refining business in the United States is in the hands of companies conclusively shown to be independents. That leaves about 88 per cent of the refining business to the trust.

Legislation beneficial to the refining interests and detrimental to their competitors necessarily assists the Sugar Trust more than $7 to every $1 that it helps the independent refiners.

In that most remarkable report which the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee make upon this free-sugar bill we are now considering they say:

> The refining interest is the most important factor connected with sugar manufacturing in the United States. Therefore the industrial position of refining requires primary consideration.

Now, as about 88 per cent of the refining industry of the country is undoubtedly controlled by the Sugar Trust, this declaration of policy means but one thing, namely, that the interests of the Sugar Trust are considered of primary importance by the Democratic Party in framing a sugar tariff. We have long wondered who it is that wears the mask with which the Sugar Trust decorates the copyrighted trade-mark on its most attractive brand—the Crystal Domino. Can it be possible that it is dear old Miss Democracy? Who would have thought two years ago, when the newspapers were filled with the revelations of the "case with the 17 holes," when the officers and employees of the Sugar Trust were being tried and convicted for stealing from the National Government, that in order to win votes in the coming election any party would dare declare that the interest of the Sugar Trust requires primary consideration in framing a sugar tariff?

This is no idle claim of those on the other side of the aisle. They are acting in accordance with this avowed policy. Three weeks ago you passed a chemical bill taking bone black from a schedule where it pays 25 per cent ad valorem duty and placed it on the free list. This material is one of the principal items of expense in refining sugar and practically no one uses it except the refiners. To-day you would pass a bill which places raw sugar on the free list and thereby relieve these same refiners from paying $53,000,000 annually into the National Treasury. If these refiners give the consumer the benefit of every dollar of the tariff removed, you have saved the refiner $1,000,000 a year in interest charges and cost of bone black. Remember that 88 per cent of this saving goes into the coffers of the Sugar Trust. If the refiners do not permanently give to the consumer the full benefit of the tariff removal, and no one believes they will, then 88 per cent of the amount thus retained by the refiners also goes into the coffers of the Sugar Trust.

Nor does the subserviency to the Sugar Trust stop here.

In the first two lines on page 5 of the majority report of the Ways and Means Committee it is plainly admitted that our domestic beet sugar offers the only competition to the refining industry. It is practically the only sugar in the United States that does not pay tribute to the refining industry, 88 per cent of which is controlled by the Sugar Trust. On the first page of this same report the committee states that during the decade ending with 1909 the number of our beet factories increased 117 per cent, the quantity of beets used increased 399 per cent, and the value of the products increased almost 700 per cent. Our domestic beet crop now constitutes our greatest source of supply other than Cuba. Here lies the real trouble. The Democratic majority cite this wonderful development of domestic beet sugar, not as a cause for congratulation but as a cause for alarm. They called before the Hardwick committee every leading refiner in the United States.

These men testified under oath as to the keenness of the competition given them by the domestic beet sugar and unanimously demanded that the duty on sugar be greatly lowered or removed entirely to check the growth of the domestic industry or destroy it completely. The Democratic Party not only listened to this proposal, but acceded to the demand of the most radical of these refiners, and their committee now reports a bill, the first of its kind in the history of the United States, in which all kinds of sugar are placed on the free list. That this bill will accomplish the end sought is freely admitted by the committee framing the measure. On page 5 of their report they give the cost of producing refined sugar in Germany as $2.415 per 100 pounds, and on the top of the next page the cost of producing domestic beet sugar as $3.54 per 100 pounds. As the freight from Europe to New York is only 12 cents per 100 pounds, it follows inevitably that the European manufacturer could make 1 cent per pound on his sugar and still sell it at the price it costs our manufacturer to produce this commodity. The European sugar producer will close our factories and then the refiners who plainly told the Hardwick committee that they were not afraid of world competition under free sugar will have an absolute monopoly in the United States. And of this refining monopoly the Sugar Trust controls 88 per cent. That which the Sugar Trust obtained by a warfare as ruthless as any waged by a robber baron of the sixteenth century, the Democratic Party would maintain unto them even to the third and fourth generation more effectually than by the law of primogeniture and entail.

Search the pages of our history and you will not find such another abject surrender to the grasping power of a monopoly. The Democratic Party, which proclaims from the housetops that it is the friend of the masses and believes in competition, says to the thousands of planters raising cane in the South, to the thousands of farmers raising beets in the North, to the thousands of workmen employed in the sugar factories of the South and the sugar factories of the North, you must give up your occupation and enter other employment unless you are willing to accept the compensation paid for similar effort in Java and Cuba and Europe. It says to the men who have invested $100,000,000 in the domestic beet-sugar industry and to the men who have invested a similar amount in the domestic cane industry, you must close these factories and abandon these fields. It says to the people of Porto Rico and Hawaii and the Philippines, we will reverse our government policy toward you and deprive you of your greatest source of prosperity. It says to Cuba, we will repudiate our treaty obligations and destroy your preferential market. It says to the economist, it is better to nurture an industry which spends $1 at home and $6 abroad, rather than one that spends $7 at home and none abroad, in producing the same commodity. It says to the historian, we disregard the wisdom of all the statesmen, Democratic and Republican, who have framed our fiscal policy during the 123 years of our national life. It says to the civilized nations of the world, we have a keener insight and a truer understanding of the principles of national prosperity than have you. All this our political opponents now say—and why? Because their leaders have listened in awe to the refiners—to Messrs. Spreckels, and Lowry, and Post, and Heike, and Arbuckle, and Gilmore, and Jamison, and Atkins, and have learned that the industrial position of the Sugar Trust requires primary consideration in framing a sugar tariff.

Gentlemen, I congratulate you. The Democratic donkey and the Sugar Trust will make a great team to haul any presidential band wagon.

In closing, let me say that very little, if anything, that might be called a general demand, has come to me from my district for any such legislation. It is true there have been some petitions on the yellow printed sheets so familiar to every Member. These sheets, I believe it is well understood, were circulated in the alleged interest of the consumer by a direct representative of the refiners. You all know the testimony.

From my old home section, from the country neighborhood where I was brought up, there came to me a resolution, which I desire to read:

> Whereas a revenue is necessary to successfully carry on the Government, we, the members of the Lafayette Grange, residents of the village of Chelsea, and of Lima, Sylvan, and Sharon Townships, politically, Republicans and Democrats, do protest against the lowering of the tariff on anything raised, produced, or manufactured in this country that under the present law brings in a revenue to the Government.
> Believing that to lower such duties would be to lower the earning ability of our citizens that earn their living with their hands, whether they reside in the city or on country farm.

This resolution just read is the answer of these constituents of mine to the blank petition sent to them for signature by the committee of wholesale grocers. How familiar that sounds in connection with the name of Lowry.

A very intelligent letter from one of my prominent constituents states that in my own district there is owned $15,000,000 worth of real estate in sugar-beet land; that this industry has increased the value of large tracts of land, and that to disturb the tariff would destroy this important branch of agriculture and manufacture.

Beyond this, it would leave the consumer absolutely at the mercy of the refiner—absolutely at the mercy of the Sugar Trust—as already indicated. It would destroy one of the greatest sources of revenue, and for all these reasons it seems utterly impossible to figure out any ground on which a representative of the American people can base his support of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I make the pro forma amendment for the purpose of saying a word in five minutes. I am against this bill. It is true that in 1890 I voted for free sugar; but at the same time I voted for a bounty of 2 cents a pound on all American-produced sugar. [Applause.] We did not need the revenue from sugar at that time. In 1888, if I recollect right, $160,000,000 of the national debt was retired and paid. Revenues were coming in at the rate of a hundred millions surplus a year, and our friends, the enemy, attacked us, saying that we were growing extravagant and collecting too much revenue. It is true that we were collecting too much, and we put sugar on the free list under those conditions, leaving ample revenue to carry on the Government and at the same time giving protection to the American industry. Under similar conditions I would cast a similar vote. Now, when we need the revenue, not getting a large overplus, you propose to dispense with nearly $60,000,000 of revenue. You do not propose any protection to the American industry. We Republicans stand for protection, whether we grow cane sugar, as they do in Louisiana, or beet sugar, as they do in Michigan, Wisconsin, Utah, California, and elsewhere. [Applause.] We stand for the protective policy for every practical American industry. Having but barely scratched this country with 90,000,000 people, to be multiplied many times in the coming generations, we would utilize American labor and promote American production from the broad standpoint of the whole 90,000,000 people instead of dividing into squads, and protecting rice because we happen to grow rice, but letting everything else that we do not happen to grow go to the devil. We consume one-fourth of the world's product of sugar.

Mr. HARDWICK. One-fifth.

Mr. CANNON. One-fifth, the gentleman says. Perhaps he is more nearly correct than I. I am speaking in general terms. We produce in the United States and our dependencies and colonies one-half of all that we consume. You put it on the free list. You say you do this to relieve the consumer. By putting it upon the free list without bounty you kill the industry. I wonder how much longer Louisiana will kiss the hand that smites her. I shall not vote to smite you. You are part and parcel of the country. So with the beet producers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment, not the paragraph, close, so that it may be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment now close. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "following," insert:
"The date when the President shall declare by proclamation that a report of the Tariff Board shows conclusively that the production of sugar in the United States will not be jeopardized by"——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes to postpone the date when this act shall take effect until that time when the President of the United States shall by proclamation declare that a report of the Tariff Board shows conclusively that the passage of this legislation will not jeopardize the sugar-growing interests of this country. I do not anticipate that any such time would ever come, but I think that that would be quite soon enough for the passage of this legislation.

In their report on this bill the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee state that the industrial position of the refining interests require primary consideration. This bill, which would destroy the only competition which the Refiners' Trust has, certainly gives the refining interest primary consideration with a vengeance. Evidently that is understood by those who deal in market securities. I note from the Washington Times of last evening and the Washington Post of this morning that the stocks of the American Sugar Refining Co.—the "Sugar Trust"—are quoted at 123½. From other reliable sources I find that the stocks of the Sugar Trust range from 116 on December 31, 1911, to 118⅛ on March 12, 1912, three days ago. Yesterday they were worth, as I have said, 123½.

On the capitalization of the Sugar Trust—forty-five million common and forty-five million preferred stock, or ninety million in all—this increase from 118⅛ to 123½ makes a difference of $5.37½ per share, or an advance in value of $4,837,500 in the stocks of the Sugar Trust since this bill was reported. The interests of the Sugar Trust have evidently received that primary consideration to which the committee said it was entitled.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. That is protecting the Sugar Trust with a vengeance.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman not know that on the 13th of March the American Sugar Refining Co. held its annual meeting and made its annual statement and declared dividends showing that they had made $14,000,000 that year, and that that is the reason the stock went up—after that statement was made.

Mr. MONDELL. That is probably in the gentleman's mind.

Mr. HARDWICK. And that is under the present tariff law.

Mr. MONDELL. The stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. has been advancing steadily ever since the Democratic Party took up the consideration of this legislation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Under your own tariff law.

Mr. MONDELL. The advance has been steady since last December, when the price was 114; and if the gentleman wants to go back a little further than the date that I first stated, to wit, to the time when his party took up the consideration of this legislation, he will find that Sugar Trust stock has increased in value since that time over $10,000,000. Surely the Democratic Party has given consideration to this great interest. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the pending measure. I do not believe that the removal of the duty on sugar is going to cheapen the cost to the ultimate consumer by the fraction of a cent. In my opinion the only practical and feasible manner in which the price of sugar can be lowered to the consumer of this country is to increase domestic production. The sooner we make ourselves independent of the sordid speculators who manipulate the foreign supply, in order to control foreign prices, the better it will be for the consumers of this country, for foreign prices affect the home market always. That was amply demonstrated last summer, when sugar went up to 7½ cents per pound in this country. We obtained a taste of the fruit of this speculation at that time. During the months of August, September, and October, 1911, sugar steadily advanced in this country, owing to an alleged shortage in the foreign crop, until it reached a price of 7½ cents per pound to the consumer. And then domestic beet sugar came upon the market. Prices dropped immediately. Sugar was soon selling at 5¾ cents per pound. The competition caused by the marketing of American beet sugar was alone responsible for this reduction. It has been the unvarying experience of many years that the refiners of this country immediately raise the price of sugar to the consumer the moment the domestic supply of beet sugar—and likewise of domestic cane sugar—has been disposed of. And I firmly believe that the adoption of the pending legislation will ultimately destroy all domestic competition, for it is bound to destroy the domestic industry.

Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of the pending measure yesterday afternoon this colloquy occurred between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. It is found on pages 3440 and 3441 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman has just stated that he is not in favor of dragging out of the people the present price of sugar. Will the gentleman explain to the House what caused the high price of sugar during the months of August and September and October in the year 1911, when there was no domestic crop on the market?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was due, to a large extent, to the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, which the gentleman helped to put into law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, I think the answer of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is entirely unworthy of him. He is the leader of the Democratic majority on this floor. He is an open and avowed candidate for the nomination for President of the United States at the hands of his party. I have long admired his ability, even though frequently I have not been able to follow his reasoning. But to attribute the rise of the price of sugar last summer to the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act is as fallacious as it is indefensible. The Payne law had been in effect many months prior to August or September or October, 1911, and yet there was no abnormal change in the cost of sugar to the consumer during the two years that intervened from the date of its passage, August 5, 1909, till the speculative increase of last summer began. The Payne law has also been in existence from November, 1911, until the present time, and the price of sugar is again normal. Judging from the ill-considered answer of my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], I am led to the belief that all of his reasoning upon this question is equally ill-considered and equally fallacious.

Nor is the gentleman at all consistent in his attitude toward tariff rates on foodstuffs. In a burst of perfervid oratory, while explaining the pending bill, the gentleman uttered a sentiment to the effect that the most unjust tax that can be levied on a people through their customhouses is a tax that is levied on the food they consume. It sounds mighty well, and when uttered in the orotund tones, with befitting gesture, so characteristic of the gentleman from Alabama, small wonder that all of his colleagues on the Democratic side of the House broke forth with rapturous applause. Evidently they have short memories. Pepper is an article that is found on every table in this country. It is used by the poor as well as the rich. Under the Payne law it is on the free list. But the Democratic majority of this House only a few days ago voted, practically unanimously, that this article of universal consumption must go upon the dutiable list; that the customhouses of the country must be utilized to collect a tax from the people of the United States upon a product that is found on every dinner table in the land. "Consistency, thou art a jewel," but thou dost not adorn the Democratic leadership or the Democratic membership of this House.

The gentlemen on the Democratic side of this Chamber contend that the removal of the duty on sugar is going to benefit the consumers of the country to the extent of the duty. The report of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, quoting Mr. Spreckels as authority for the statement, adopt it as their own. The distinguished leader of the Democratic majority, quoting the same authority, also adopts it. But we have heard that siren song before. Those of us who were here in the Sixty-first Congress remember the fight for free hides. Putting hides upon the free list was going to make leather cheaper, and making leather cheaper was going to reduce the cost of shoes to the consumers. And hides went on the free list under the Payne law. What has been the result? Neither hides nor leather nor shoes have become cheaper; on the contrary, they have advanced in price. Why has not the consumer received the benefit of this reduction in the tariff, at least to the extent of the former duty? If the theories now promulgated by the Democratic side of this House are correct, that is precisely what should have happened; and I feel confident that if their theories in regard to the reduction of the duty on sugar were, unfortunately, put into effect, they would prove to be as equally unsound.

Mr. Chairman, we have had one experience in recent years in reducing the duty on sugar. In the month of December, 1903, the Cuban reciprocity law was passed, and the duty on sugar was reduced 20 per cent.

If the contention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] be true, and he quoted Mr. Claus Spreckels as his authority that the reduction of the duty on sugar will inure to the benefit of the consumers, then the consumers of this country should have received the benefit of the 20 per cent reduction that was given under the Cuban reciprocity law. But what are the facts? I have here a letter from Mr. Truman G. Palmer, in which he gives me the exact figures in regard to the retail and wholesale price of sugar for several years before and several years after the Cuban reciprocity law was enacted.

Mr. Palmer's letter reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1912.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of yesterday, and in reply I hand you herewith the New York wholesale price of refined sugar for four years prior to Cuban reciprocity (December, 1903) and four years subsequent, as given by Messrs. Willett & Gray. Also, the United States retail price of granulated sugar for the same years, as given by the Bureau of Labor. The figures are as follows, the first column being the New York wholesale price and the second column the average United States retail price:

	New York wholesale price.	Average retail price, United States.
1900	5.32	5.97
Average, 4 years	4.87	5.69
1904	4.77	5.80
1905	5.26	5.92
1907	4.65	5.67
Average, 4 years	4.80	5.74

* * * * * * *

Trusting that this will serve your purpose, I am,
Yours, very truly,

TRUMAN G. PALMER.

So we see that in 1900 the wholesale price was 5.32 cents per pound; the retail price was 5.97 cents; in 1901 the wholesale price was 5.05 cents, the retail price 5.86 cents; in 1902 the wholesale price was 4.46 cents, the retail price 5.47 cents; in 1903 the wholesale price was 4.64 cents, the retail price 5.47 cents. The average price for the four years was, wholesale, 4.87 cents per pound; retail, 5.69 cents. And then the Cuban reciprocity law went into effect, and in 1904, the very year in which it became operative and the duty was reduced 20 per cent on Cuban sugar, the price to the consumer went up from 5.47 cents to 5.80 cents per pound; in 1905 it went up to 5.92 cents; in 1906 it was 5.59 cents; and in 1907 it was 5.67 cents.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield. I have not the time.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr KAHN. So that it shows conclusively that the retail price of sugar to the consumer went up after the passage of the Cuban reciprocity law instead of coming down.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, it will be contended that this reduction of 20 per cent was made in order to help Cuba; that there was no suggestion of a reduction of the price to the consumer at the time that law went into effect. But I doubt whether anyone will contend that the American consumer has ever received any material benefit from the 20 per cent reduction in Cuban sugar, although the quantity of sugar imported from the island of Cuba under the reciprocity law has increased from 998,878 long tons in 1902–3 to approximately 1,900,000 long tons in 1910–11.

In addition to the reduction of duty on Cuban sugar, Porto Rican sugar has been admitted free, and the production has increased from 85,000 metric tons in 1902 to 320,000 metric tons in 1910–11. Philippine sugar to the extent of 300,000 tons per annum is now admitted free, and the production in the Philippines has increased from 90,000 long tons in 1902–3 to 150,000 long tons in 1910–11. And yet, notwithstanding all these reductions of duty, the average American prices of raw and refined sugar have been uniformly higher during the past five years than during the preceding five years. That fact is further proof that the reduction of the duty does not inure to the benefit of the consumer to the extent of the duty. And why does not the consumer get this benefit? Because extraneous matters affect the price of sugar, just as they affect the price of all other commodities. The laws of supply and demand, the conditions of the crops; as they are affected by rain, drought, and flood; the efforts of speculators to control output; the strength of the refiners and the poverty of the planters, all have a bearing on the question of price of sugar, and we ought to be honest enough to say so. We ought not to try to delude the American consumer into the belief that he will get his sugar cheaper to the extent of the duty when the duty is removed. Past experience shows that that is not so, and on account of the reasons I have just stated I am satisfied it never will be so.

But, sir, what happened to Sugar Trust stock after the Cuban reciprocity law went into effect? In 1902 the common stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. reached a maximum of $135\frac{1}{8}$ per share; in 1903 it fell to $134\frac{3}{4}$ as the maximum price. In December of that year the Cuban reciprocity law was enacted. In 1904 Sugar Trust stock jumped to $153 per share, in 1905 to $154\frac{1}{4}$, and in 1906 it attained a maximum of $157 per share. So we see that Sugar Trust stock jumped upward of $20 per share as a result of that legislation, while the American consumer is still waiting for a reduction on the cost of Cuban sugar to the extent of the differential of 20 per cent. And, according to the logic of the Democratic majority of this House, he ought to have had that reduction from the time of the enactment of the Cuban reciprocity law.

Mr. Chairman, do the gentlemen on the Democratic side expect the Sugar Trust barons, who for years have been robbing the Government of the United States by bribing officials in New York City to underweigh the amount of sugar actually arriving at that port, and who last summer manipulated the American market on account of an alleged shortage of the European crop so as to increase the price to the consumer 2 cents per pound, to immediately become public philanthropists? Do they expect these refiners to reduce the cost of sugar to the consumer to the extent of the duty, if the present tariff be taken off? It is idle to dream of such a thing.

The effect of this legislation will be to kill off domestic production, and having killed it off we will be absolutely and entirely at the mercy of the sugar-refining barons. They will then be able to raise the cost to the consumer not alone 2 cents but 3 or 4 or 5 cents per pound at their own sweet will. The effect of this legislation will be to decrease our revenues by $53,000,000 per annum. Instead of raising this great sum by an indirect tax, as is done under existing law, gentlemen on the other side propose to levy a direct tax on the people of this country. Direct taxation has never been popular in this country from the very beginning of our Government. It has generally been resorted to only as a war measure, and as soon as our wars have been over the people have clamored for the repeal of direct taxes. The temper of the American people has not changed in that regard. You of the majority may try to delude yourselves into the belief that you are fooling the people, but you are not. They understand, and they will show their resentment at the ballot box next November.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to make this remark. I have debated this question at length, but I wish to say that such a speech as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has made does not do any credit to his opinion of the intelligence of this House. He does not show us in that statement whether the Cuban crop was already high or whether there was a drought that year or not.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I decline to yield. The gentleman declined to yield to me.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HARDWICK. I decline to yield. The gentleman would not yield to me. I want to say this to the gentleman, that he must have a poor opinion of the intelligence of this House if he does not produce the figures as to the crop shortage or excesses, the figures as to the rain and the drought and the floods. Does not the gentleman know that, for instance, as to the cotton crop, entirely unaffected as it is by any tariff, if there is a shortage in that crop the price goes up, and if there is an excess in the cotton crop the price goes down? And those things affected the Cuban prices, and as to the effect of Cuban reciprocity, the testimony is undisputed and indisputable that the Cuban prices were affected as to the American consumer to just one-half of the reduction in duty. The American consumer got one-half of the Cuban reciprocity differential; the American refiner got one-fourth of it; and the Cuban planter got one-fourth.

It never was thought, Mr. Chairman, by anybody who understood the situation, that to give Cuba a 20 per cent differential would reduce the price of sugar to the American consumer, because it simply put the Cuban planter within the tariff wall and let him levy that much tax on American consumption. The purpose of the bill was entirely different from that. It was to help Cuba, and the only reason he did not get it all was because the refiners were so strong; it was because American capital was so largely invested there; and because the people there were so poor and needy that the planters and the producers had to sell it quickly and throw it on the market all at once. The gentleman's figures are entirely misleading. He does not put in substantial facts that must be put in in order to understand the figures he quotes from Mr. Palmer.

I now yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman's side had refused debate on the matter. I had only five minutes' of time. I might have gone into the thing fully if your side had given us ample time to discuss the matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want you to print your speech, and if you want it to appeal to the intelligence of this country, put in it the figures in reference to Cuban crop conditions and as to the size of the Cuban crop and the world's crop for each year.

Mr. KAHN. I intend to put them in, and I intend to put in what happened when Hawaiian reciprocity was enacted. I shall print my speech in full, and it will convict the gentleman and his party of the absolute injustice to the American people and the American producer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment to this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PROTEST AGAINST THE REMOVAL OF THE PRESENT DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, 45 years ago I left what I then believed to be the finest city in the United States, the only city which I then supposed any self-respecting American would really select as his permanent home—the city of Boston. My father had made investment in the pine lands of Michigan, and our only hope was that we might be able to make enough money in the next 10 or 15 years to enable us to get back to that city of Boston to spend the remainder of our days.

As we became interested in the cutting and manufacturing of pine timber the dream faded away and we were glad to be identified with that splendid State of Michigan, a portion of which it is my good fortune to represent on this floor.

When we landed in what is now the tenth district of Michigan, the railroad had reached only to its boundary. There were no railroads within the district, and its 200 miles of length and nearly 100 miles of width was a frontier country and an undeveloped wilderness. In those early years I have spent winters in lumber camps 60 miles distant from any town or hamlet.

Then pine was king, and that great wilderness was thinly populated with the sturdy pioneer lumbermen, some from Maine, some from Pennsylvania, other from the French and Scotch settlements of Canada, but all of hardy, virile manhood, physically and mentally—splendid specimens of American manhood.

As the years rolled by there came an end to the harvesting of the pine. The splendid lands upon which the forests of white pine had grown were cleared by the hardy settlers who came in in those years, and what had been a wilderness rapidly developed into a magnificent farming country. It was thought by many that when the cutting of the pine was finished the cities and towns that had grown up as a result of the lumbering industry would, like the busted boom towns of the West, be depopulated and forgotten. That has proved far from the truth. Those stalwart, pioneer lumbermen who had made a reasonable competence keenly watched for and sought other industries wherein their capital and their energies might be with profit employed. Among other industries, it was found that the lands in that part of Michigan were favorably adapted to the growing of the sugar beet, and in 1898—only 14 years ago—the first beet-sugar factory was erected, and we now have three large sugar factories in active operation in my district.

These factories in my district have been a great boon to the farming element in that locality, consuming, as they do, 3,000 tons of beets daily during the working season.

These three factories sliced this year 307,106 tons of beets. Can you realize what this means? These beets loaded on standard freight cars would make 12,284 carloads, and if put into one continuous train would make a train 100 miles long, all loaded with sugar beets. It means that 7,848 farmers within my district each had a part in producing this great bulk of raw material, for which they received $1,750,000, or an average of $5.70 per ton.

The raising of sugar beets is not an easy matter. It requires industry and intelligence. The progressive farmer is willing to enter new fields and to develop new lines, and the farmers of my district, by their industry and intelligence, have made a splendid success of sugar-beet raising, as these figures indicate.

The output of these three factories was 58,364,000 pounds, or 182,400 barrels, of granulated sugar. The average price obtained was $5.45 per hundred pounds, which is about 1 cent per pound more than the average price that the factories have received in all the preceding years of their existence. While the price was higher this year, it was by no means a profitable season, owing to climatic conditions more adverse this year than has ever been known in the history of the business. Continuous and heavy rainfall in September, October, and November made the harvesting of the beets exceedingly expensive for the farmers in the rain and mud. But, worse than this, in November there came three weeks of excessively frosty winter weather, freezing solid the beets as they were delivered in the bins of the factories. This would have worked no harm had they remained frozen; but the three weeks of winter weather were followed by a week or 10 days of warm, thawing weather, drawing the frost out of the beets entirely, so that at least one-half of the beets handled this year were handled at a loss to the factory.

This, however, was an exceptional year. On the average the industry has been satisfactory and profitable. That it has been satisfactory to the farmers is evidenced by the fact that the factories are able to contract for acreage beyond their slicing capacity, and it will soon be a question of the enlargement of factories or building new ones. One of the factories was increased last year from 900 to 1,400 tons daily slicing capacity, and the other two factories have increased their capacity from 600 to 800 tons per day.

In connection with these three beet-sugar factories in my district there is, at Bay City, the Michigan Chemical Co., who manufacture from the refuse molasses from these three factories high-grade alcohol, from which the Government has derived a direct revenue of upward of $5,000,000 in the last two years. The destruction of the beet-sugar industry, which will result should this bill under consideration become a law, would entail a loss to the Government annually of $2,500,000 now derived from the output of this chemical company.

I have in this statement tried to show to you that conditions in my district pertaining to this industry are at present prosperous and satisfactory to both farmers and manufacturers. Precisely similar conditions pertain to the industry in the factories of Congressman FORDNEY'S district, where 5 factories are located, and, in fact, over the entire State of Michigan, with its 17 factories at work this year.

These Michigan factories this year sliced 1,400,000 tons of beets. By the same measure just employed to show what this great bulk means, these sugar beets sliced in our Michigan factories this year would load 70,000 cars, and would make a continuous train 560 miles long. For these beets the farmers of Michigan received $8,000,000 in cash. The output of sugar this year from these Michigan factories will amount to about 350,000,000 pounds, or 1,000,000 barrels of sugar.

This splendid industry in Michigan, as shown by this statement, is only a sample of this growing industry shared by 17 States of the Union, where the growing of sugar beets and the production of sugar is obtaining a vigorous foothold, producing this last year 530,000 tons, or 3,312,500 barrels, of sugar—one-sixth of our entire consumption.

How was it possible to establish this splendid agricultural industry? There is but one answer—it is the result of Republican protective tariff. It is the result of the policy advocated by James G. Blaine and William McKinley, who believed that the $100,000,000 or more which we were then paying yearly to foreign countries for sugar—it would be over $200,000,000 to-day—could just as well be retained at home and employment to that amount given to our own people. This policy was not shared by our Democratic friends, for we find in the St. Louis platform of the Republican Party, June 18, 1896, this declaration:

> We condemn the present Democratic administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican Party favors such protection as will hold the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

This protection, so promised, was given by the provision in the Dingley bill on the instant when the Republicans returned to power in 1897, and has harmed no one, for sugar is as cheap to the consumer, and in fact cheaper, than it was prior to the time when this protection was granted. Its result has been the building up of 71 factories now in operation in this country, producing this year 530,000 long tons of beet sugar, paying out in its production to American labor upward of $44,000,000.

These factories require to operate them 25,000 factory laborers, while from 110,000 to 125,000 farmers are engaged in growing the beets on the farms, which does not include the laborers employed by the farmers.

Now, what is proposed? By the bill before the House it is proposed to remove the protective duty on sugar and admit free of duty the sugar produced by the cheap labor of other lands. It is claimed by those who are favoring this bill that it will reduce the price to the consumer 1½ cents per pound, which is more than the amount of duty levied on sugar as it is imported into the country from Cuba to-day. In this I believe they are entirely mistaken. With the duty removed, the cane and beet sugar industries, supplying nearly a million tons of sugar in this country to-day, annihilated; not only that, but our own island possession, Hawaii, now furnishing 500,000 tons of sugar for our use this year, practically ruined; Porto Rico and the Philippines, if not ruined, the industry greatly retarded, what can we expect as inevitable? Surely that those who now supply to us our sugar from Cuba and Europe will ask and obtain a higher price from us than they are now receiving. The refiners of raw sugar in the United States are clamoring for this measure, with but one motive, as a matter of course—that they can make more money by using the sugars imported from other countries when our own production is effectually stopped. They may reduce the price temporarily, until our home industry is effaced; but then watch for higher prices, which will surely follow. With the beet-sugar industry out of the way, they can dictate the price absolutely to the consumers, and, what is more certain, that instead of the consumer getting the benefit of that 1½ cents reduction of duty, a goodly share of it will be absorbed by the higher price demanded by the foreign producers of raw sugar and by the absorbing of a portion of this reduction by the sugar refiners. I can not bring myself to believe that the consumer in this country will obtain his sugar at more than one-half or, at the utmost, 1 cent per pound below the normal average price in the last 10 years.

Those favoring this proposition try to make us believe that this reduction of 1½ cents per pound would apply to the 80 pounds per capita consumed by each individual in this country—actual amount 81.60 for 1910 and 79.2 for 1911. Many suppose that this 80 pounds per capita means the average amount consumed in the family by each person. That is far from the truth. In the evidence brought out in the hearings of the Hardwick committee it was shown that only 30 pounds of the 80 were really used in the household. That 50 pounds of the 80, or five-eighths of our total sugar consumption, was absorbed in manufactures, from which the consumer would get no benefit whatever. These lines of manufacture in which sugar are used are of great number, among the larger of which we find candies of all kinds, canned fruits and preserves, condensed milk, bakers, as well as in the manufacture of whisky and tobacco. An enormous amount of sugar is used in the manufacture of sirups used for soda water and in chewing gums.

It needs no argument to indicate that no benefit to the consumer would be obtained in this five-eighths of the sugar consumption. The soda fountains would not enlarge the size of their glass or diminish the quantity of froth because sugar is half a cent or 1 cent less per pound. Twenty-five million pounds of sugar are annually used in chewing gum in this country, and while sugar costs the manufacturer about 5 cents per pound, the consumer pays $1 per pound for the sugar contained in chewing gum. Is it supposable that a stick of gum will be enlarged or any benefit come to the consumer because of the abolition of the duty on the sugar used in it? The utmost benefit to be derived by bringing in for our entire consumption sugar produced by the cheap labor of other countries—for the wages are about one-third of those paid to labor in this country—is that the average consumer on his 30 pounds' annual consumption will save somewhere between 15 to 30 cents a year.

Here let me say that this removal of duty on sugar does not come from any clamor of the consuming public. Sugar is and has been one of the cheapest commodities of household consumption. In all the cry from the public, and especially those who toil, because of the increased cost of living, no part of any increased cost of living pertains to sugar. Notwithstanding the price has been in large measure controlled by the sugar refiners or the trust, the price of sugar has remained the same, or practically a dead level, for the last 20 years. There was a time, from the date of the Civil War down to about 30 years ago—when sugar ranged from 22.56 cents wholesale in 1864 to 9.35 cents per pound in 1882—that sugar was an expensive commodity; but that is past and gone, and the American consumer has no reason to complain and is not complaining at the price paid for sugar during the last 20 years. He gets his sugar, by money value, cheaper than the consumers of any other country in the world, save England, and there it is about half a cent to 1 cent per pound cheaper than it is here. In not a single nation on the globe is sugar free. In every nation it is subject either to an import duty or an excise or internal-revenue tax. In every country sugar is one of the articles on which duty is levied to produce revenue for the running expenses of the Government—just the same as it is here. But the real measure of cheapness of sugar to the American consumer is not in its money value, but in its labor value, and by that I mean to say that a day's labor in the United States will buy twice as much sugar as in any other country in the world, even including England. A day's wage in America will buy four times as much sugar as a day's wage in Germany or France, while in Spain, Portugal, Italy, and other cheap-labor countries, like China and Japan, a day's wages here will buy ten to twenty times as much sugar as it will in those countries. When we notice by the statistics that the per capita consumption of sugar in Spain and Portugal is only 14.2 pounds, it is easy to know the reason why. It is because the people are so poorly paid and the price of sugar so high—Madrid, Spain, 12 cents; Rome, Italy, 14 cents—that they can not afford sugar at all as a common article of use in their daily lives. In five European countries the annual consumption of sugar is under 10 pounds per capita.

Remove this duty and two grave dangers confront you:

First. The exporting countries may levy an export tax on sugar coming to the United States equal to the duty you now remove, just the same as Brazil did on coffee when we placed it on the free list years ago. That means that the exporting countries will profit by your foolishness by fifty or sixty million dollars annually, which our Treasury now receives from the duty on sugar.

Second. By your annihilation of the beet-sugar and cane-sugar industries in the United States you destroy the only competition of the sugar refiners, six or eight in number. These refiners will then control the price to the consumer absolutely. Do not forget that only four months ago, when the refiners had forced the price up to 7½ cents per pound, the coming in of the home crop of beet sugar forced that price down to 5½ cents, and this when the European price has not declined, owing to their 2,000,000 tons shortage in this year's crop.

Do you claim that the beet-sugar industry is under trust control? It is untrue. Of the beet-sugar crop of 1910, from the 71 factories, 457,000 tons, the interest of the American Sugar Refining Co. in 33 of these factories was only 96,221 tons, or 21 per cent.

I am pleading for the business men of my district, who have invested their capital in this industry and whose ruin will be certain; for the 7,848 farmers whose welfare is deeply concerned in this measure; and for the 225,000 population of my district, who indirectly are keenly interested.

The illustration recently used by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] expresses exactly the situation. As the wounded gladiator in the Roman amphitheater looked with appealing eyes to Cæsar, he by his thumb pointing upward could give life and hope, or by pointing it downward bring sure death.

In behalf of the people of my district I appeal to you on the Democratic side of this House, that by your vote—as quick and effective as Cæsar's thumb—you do not annihilate a magnificent agricultural industry, but give to it life and hope. [Applause.]

SUGAR MEN SAFE—HIGH PRICE GIVES THEM A PROFIT ON POOR QUALITY BEETS.

LANSING, MICH., February 23, 1912.

Wednesday afternoon the Lansing factory of the Owosso Sugar Co. concluded the longest and biggest run it has ever known, having in 126 days sliced 74,000 tons of sugar beets, or enough to make 16,600,000 pounds of sugar, and having paid over $500,000 to farmers. Another week will be required in which to transform the sliced beets into sugar. Despite the fact that this has been a record season for the Lansing factory, Manager George L. Wall says:

"The sugar-beet men of Michigan would certainly lose money on this year's run if it were not for the high price of sugar. The season was the most unsatisfactory that factories in general throughout the State have ever known.

"In the first place, the weather has been such that the beets have been delivered in bad condition. There was much rain in the fall, unusually warm weather in December, and extremely low temperature in January and February. The factories have used the farmers very well indeed, accepting their beets, although the percentage of sugar has been very low, and many were actually rotten, having been frozen."

[By unanimous consent Mr. LOUD was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, fortunately for this House, and the country as well, the issue presented by this measure is clearly defined. There is no attempt to conceal its effect on the domestic industry of this country of either beet or cane sugar. The majority of the Ways and Means Committee have reported their findings of certain ultimate facts back of which they can not go. These facts show a difference of 1.125 cents per pound in the cost of producing beet sugar in this country and Germany.

Yesterday when the distinguished leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was addressing the House and attempting to show that there was no difference in the cost of production, I asked him to reconcile his position with the findings of the Ways and Means Committee as well as of the Hardwick committee. He waived the question aside with the remark that those were the findings of the Hardwick committee. They were, however, accepted by the Ways and Means Committee and incorporated in their committee report. When a Representative from Louisiana asked the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] what would be the probable effect of this measure upon the cane-sugar industry in the South, he was frank enough to reply that he did not know.

Mr. Chairman, I have examined with care the voluminous hearings of the Hardwick committee, comprising 4,000 pages. The committee covered a wide range of investigation. The testimony taken by the committee shows conclusively that the sugar refiners have carried on and financed a well-organized campaign to create a demand for this legislation. They are bending every energy to destroy their competitor, the beet-sugar industry, for the evidence established without contradiction that beet sugar has forced the Sugar Trust and refiners to lower their prices to the consumer, and during three months of the year, when beet sugar is being marketed, has driven them out of the Middle West because they could not meet beet-sugar prices; that this competition has been growing more severe year by year; that the competition between beet sugar and the refiners has brought lower prices to the consumer; that during last summer and fall, when the refiners had control of the market, they shot the price of sugar up as high as 7½ cents per pound, and held the price up until beet sugar came on the market.

Every refiner who was examined by the committee admitted their desire for either a material reduction in the duty on sugar or absolute free trade in the expressed hope and belief that such action would wipe out the beet-sugar industry, and it clearly appears that the Sugar Trust and refiners will be the greatest beneficiaries of this measure.

The hearings absolutely disprove the extravagant claims as to the benefit which the consumer will receive and shows that in a broad economic sense it will not benefit the consumer. The expert employed by the committee, the greatest authority on the sugar subject in this country, if not in the world, stated emphatically that a decrease in the price of sugar could only be hoped for through an increase in home production.

It is shown that the beet-sugar industry has gone forward with leaps and bounds, notwithstanding there has scarcely been a year since the Dingley law was passed when the industry has not been embarrassed by the uncertainty of legislation and that if it is afforded protection measured by the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad it will continue to grow until every pound of sugar used in this country is raised on American soil and sold to the consumer under the law of actual competition.

The encouragement of the beet-sugar industry will aid the agricultural development of this country through its indirect benefits in the increased yield of other crops, which has been demonstrated in Germany and France as well as in this country—in brief, wherever tried.

If this measure passes it will benefit, first, the Sugar Trust and refiners; second, the manufacturers who use sugar; and, third, and in the least degree, the consumer, conceding everything that is claimed for it. It can not be sustained from an economic or political standpoint.

Up to this time the country has been flooded with the literature sent out and paid for by the masked agencies of the Sugar Trust and refiners, but when the true facts are known it will find few defenders. The claims that are made for it by its Democratic sponsors are repudiated by the findings of their own committees. [Applause on the Republican side.]

With a view of setting forth more fully the facts and reasons in support of my position, I will avail myself of the privilege granted of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

Before taking up the merits of the measure I will refer to the influences that have been most active in urging it—in short, disclose the real parties in interest. It is certainly pertinent to know who is back of the agitation on the subject—who will be its greatest beneficiaries. Fortunately, the facts are susceptible of proof.

During the past year a vast amount of literature has been disseminated, reciting in harrowing terms the burden resting upon the people through the duty on sugar; that the duty has been retained for the express benefit of the sugar refiners—a tribute, so to speak, levied on the consumer for the sugar barons—and appealing to the people to remove the duty and thereby strike a blow at the Sugar Trust. Figures, veritably appalling, but without any regard to truth, have been cited as the price the American people have been paying for the maintenance of the beet-sugar industry. Coming apparently from some philanthropic source, this literature has had its effect, as is evidenced by the petitions received, mostly on the forms sent out by the promoters of the movement.

It now appears that this movement was started, carried on, and financed by the sugar refiners for the express purpose of eliminating their only competition—the beet-sugar industry. This fact is established by the evidence taken before the Sugar Trust investigating committee, known by the name of its distinguished chairman, Mr. HARDWICK. I have in my files several of the circulars to which I refer. Here is one purporting to come from "a committee of wholesale grocers," Mr. F. C. Lowry, secretary and treasurer, headed as follows:

Formed to assist in obtaining cheaper sugar for consumers through reduction of duties on raw and refined sugars.

And in large type, "our high sugar tariff."

Listen to this:

We are, therefore, being taxed solely for the benefit of the Lousiana and domestic beet-sugar producers, who supply only 25 per cent of our requirements. The former for many years catered to the interests of the Sugar Trust, and the domestic beet-sugar industry is controlled by the trust. As a matter of fact, the Sugar Trust and their friends have been the sole beneficiaries of this excessive tariff.

Here is another:

It now remains to be seen whether the Sugar Trust will still have more influence with our legislators than the interests of the 93,000,000 consumers in the United States.

It concludes with the following plea:

So that you may assist in this work, we have prepared the inclosed petitions, which we wish you would have signed and sent to your Representative in Washington at the earliest date possible. An excellent plan would be to paste one of these petitions on the top of a sheet of paper and have as many men as possible sign under it.

Of course the reader assumed that the author of the circular was some charitable gentleman working in the interest of the consumer, and many of these petitions were signed as requested.

Who is this F. C. Lowry? He is the sales agent of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. Under whose direction were these circulars prepared and sent out? The Federal Sugar Refining Co. Who paid the bills? The Federal Sugar Refining Co. These are the facts as they appear of record in the hearings before the Hardwick committee. He admitted that he was sales agent for the Federal Sugar Refining Co.; that the so-called committee was purely a fictitious creation; that it never held a meeting; that he was working solely for the Federal Sugar Refining Co., which was the only subscriber, and whose contribution was the modest sum of $12,000.

I will quote briefly from his testimony as it appears on pages 1608 and 1609 of the hearings, so that the RECORD will show his admission in his own words:

Mr. FORDNEY. So that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. have paid in this $12,000 for the distribution of the literature?
Mr. LOWRY. Yes.
Mr. FORDNEY. And no other concern has paid in any sums of money?
Mr. LOWRY. No other concern; no.
Mr. FORDNEY. The Federal Sugar Refining Co., then, are interested in the so-called committee and its work, are they not?
Mr. LOWRY. They are unquestionably interested in its work; yes.
Mr. FORDNEY. You have said that they contributed all of the money.
Mr. LOWRY. They contributed the money that enabled us to carry on that campaign.
Mr. FORDNEY. The Federal Sugar Refining Co. has paid, then, for the distribution of all this literature?
Mr. LOWRY. Yes; so far they have.

Mr. John Arbuckle, in an interview last fall, came out in the open and said:

I purpose to devote all my time and all my ability and all my strength to the abolition of all import duties on raw sugar.

Every refiner who was before the committee admitted, under oath, the interest of the refiners in securing a material reduction in or removal of the duty. While the activity of other refiners was not disclosed, does anyone doubt that their influence was exerted. Every one knows that these great interests reach out in many and devious ways to accomplish their aims. Having established their interest in certain legislation, it is reasonably safe to infer their activity in accomplishing it. After a careful examination of the hearings, I fail to find any evidence or claim that any influence, other than the refiners, was engaged in carrying on the campaign which has resulted in this bill.

Deeming it important that the relationship of the sugar refiners to this legislation, their keen desire for and interest in its passage, be clearly understood I will quote briefly from the testimony of their representatives before the Hardwick committee. It will not do for the sponsors for this measure to charge that they are aiming at the sugar refiners, for the facts do not sustain them, but, on the contrary, show that the sugar refiners will be its beneficiaries and are intensely interested in its passage.

Mr. Edward F. Atkins, acting president of the American Sugar Refining Co., testified as follows (Hearings, vol. 1, p. 174):

Mr. HINDS. So that a serious check to that industry (beet sugar) by lowering the tariff would tend to increase greatly the business of the refining companies?
Mr. ATKINS. It would increase the business of the refining companies.
Mr. HINDS. So that a reduction of the tariff passing beyond a moderate amount would tend to the prosperity of the refiners and to the detriment of the beet-sugar people?
Mr. ATKINS. They say, and I think they say truly, that it is for the refiners' interest to have a low rate of duty rather than a high rate of duty.

Charles R. Heike, formerly secretary of the American Sugar Refining Co., testified as follows (Hearings, vol. 1, p. 202):

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar could we produce either cane or beets in this country?
Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.
Mr. FORDNEY. Then that would destroy the industry absolutely in this country?
Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Here is admitted their desire to absolutely destroy the beet-sugar industry and that free sugar will do it—that they know what they are about is quite manifest.

Mr. James H. Post, president of the National Sugar Co., testifies as follows (Hearings, vol. 1, p. 527):

As far as I personally am concerned, I would like to see free sugar.

Of course he would like to see free sugar. Why not, if it will kill beet-sugar competition and enlarge their market?

Mr. William A. Jamison, one of the partners of Arbuckle Bros., says (Hearings, vol. 2, p. 1195):

Mr. RAKER. How would it affect you if there was no tax on the importation of raw sugar?
Mr. JAMISON. I think it would enable us to run more constantly.
Mr. RAKER. What do you mean by that now?
Mr. JAMISON. To keep up the capacity.
Mr. RAKER. Will you explain it?
Mr. JAMISON. I mean we would be able to sell more sugar.
Mr. RAKER. Do you not have a supply all the time?
Mr. JAMISON. Well, we are not able to run full at all times.
Mr. RAKER. Because of the way raw sugar is shipped into the United States?
Mr. JAMISON. Oh, no; on account of the beet product. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar; if the duty were removed, I mean to say.

A very frank as well as truthful admission.

Mr. Claus A. Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., which contributed $12,000 for carrying on the campaign which has resulted in the introduction of this bill, says (Hearings, vol. 3, p. 2277):

Mr. HINDS. In other words, perhaps, you would take it (the duty) all off, would you not, and have free trade?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I would have free trade.
Mr. HINDS. You would have free trade in sugar?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Absolutely.

Does anyone suppose that these gentlemen who have built up colossal fortunes in refining sugar do not know their business? Is anyone guileless enough to think that they have organized a sort of eleemosynary club for the benefit of the consumer? They know their business. They understand market conditions. They realize when they have a competitor.

If there is any fact established by the record beyond the possibility of contradiction, it is the vital interest which the sugar refiners have in the passage of this bill. They know what the future of the beet-sugar industry will be. They see it now just at the point of emerging from infancy into the virility of manhood, an active and effective competitor, and that unless this measure passes and the industry is destroyed, the time is not far distant when the beet-sugar industry will furnish substantially all the sugar that is consumed by our people.

Let us consider briefly the history of the beet-sugar industry and its future as bearing on the reason why the refiners both feel and fear its competition, and from the further standpoint of the Republican policy of protection to ascertain if it justifies protection. If it does, I can not see how any Republican can vote for this measure.

The Republican national platform in 1896 declared as follows:

We condemn the present administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country, and the Republican Party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

The people were in a receptive mood for the doctrine of protection at that time. They had just experienced an object lesson under the Wilson bill—a lesson so disastrous that the Democratic Party was driven from power in an overwhelming defeat which ushered in the splendid administration of William McKinley.

The last Republican national convention reasserted its interest in the sugar industry.

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries, * * * the aim and purpose of the Republican policy being not only to preserve, without excessive duties, that security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled, but also to maintain the high standard of living of the wage earners of this country, who are the most direct beneficiaries of the protective system. Between the United States and the Philippines we believe in a free interchange of products with such limitations as to sugar and tobacco as will afford adequate protection to domestic interests.

Upon what theory can any Republican claim that the sugar industry should be exempt from the protection for which our party stands, and particularly in view of its specific indorsement of that industry?

The Dingley law went into effect in 1897. In 1896 there were 6 beet-sugar factories in the United States. Now there are 71. In 1896 there were 22,948 acres planted in beets; in 1910, 429,014. In 1896 the number of pounds produced was 65,453,000; in 1910, 1,019,692,800.

I submit that this is a remarkable record and that it has few parallels in our industrial history. But, remarkable as these figures are, they become even more remarkable when we look at the legislative history on the sugar question during the intervening period. Everyone knows that stability in legislation is necessary to encourage investment. There has hardly been a year since the Dingley law was placed on the statute books when legislation relating to sugar has not been either agitated or under consideration. Is there any wonder that it has not developed more rapidly? The wonder is that it has grown as rapidly as it has. The year after the Dingley law went into effect the Hawaiian Islands were annexed, which gave permanency to our relations with those islands, which, in turn, is reflected in the increased importation of Hawaiian sugar from 204,833 long tons in 1897 to 506,096 long tons in 1910.

As a result of the Spanish War we acquired Porto Rico, and in a short time thereafter free trade was granted to that island. Its sugar crop has increased from 85,000 long tons in 1902 to 295,000 long tons in 1910.

From 1897 to 1901 the beet-sugar industry increased rapidly, 32 new factories being added during that brief period. But in the year 1901 the agitation for Cuban reciprocity commenced. The possibility for increased sugar production in Cuba was realized. The fears of the domestic producers were well grounded as to the effect reciprocity would have on Cuban production.

The reciprocity agreement became effective in December, 1903. The year preceding there were 998,878 long tons produced in Cuba, which increased in nine years to 1,900,000 long tons, with admission into the United States at 20 per cent reduction in duty. The natural and logical effect of Cuban reciprocity was to halt the development of the beet-sugar industry for a time. It was a severe shock. The Secretary of Agriculture submitted a report in 1902 on "The progress of the beet-sugar industry of the United States in 1901." On page 27, under the heading, "Proposed new factories," the report says:

Below is given a list showing location, daily capacity, and estimated cost of construction and equipment of the beet-sugar projects now under consideration. These projects are in different stages of discussion, organization, and capitalization. Some concerns are fully organized and capitalized; in other cases conditions have been canvassed and organization seems probable. Nearly all these projects are likely to materialize in the future, provided questions affecting the beet-sugar industry are settled.

This list includes only such projects as came to my attention during my investigations of the past year, and is authentic as far as it goes. There are doubtless others of which I have no definite information. To install these factories would require an investment of $49,000,000. In addition they would require annually a working capital of $9,080,000. They would purchase from the farmers annually beets to the amount of $14,700,000, besides a great many other crude materials, and would employ a large number of laborers.

Then follows a list of 86 projects or factories that would have been built. Of these 86 projects, 1 was completed in 1902; 6 others in 1903, before the treaty went into effect; and the remaining 79 were permanently abandoned. Such was the effect on the industry of putting into effect Cuban reciprocity.

Next came the concession of 25 per cent to the Philippines, and finally came the revision of the tariff in 1909 with the further concession of 300,000 tons free of duty from the Philippines and the slight reduction in the duty on refined sugar of 5 cents. At the time the Payne bill was under consideration there was a very active discussion over the duty on sugar, and since then the Sugar Trust and refiners have been carrying on a well-organized campaign against the sugar duty.

So that I say there has scarcely been a year since the beet-sugar industry was actually started under the Dingley law down to the present time when the duty on sugar has not been, in one form or another, under consideration. It has been a period of uncertainty. What acts would be passed and their effect could not be foreseen. There was lacking that element of permanency in legislation necessary to encourage the highest developments of the industry. Notwithstanding all this, the beet-sugar industry has developed with leaps and bounds and demonstrated its power as a competitor of the sugar refiners.

There is no claim that the beet-sugar interests have ever entered into any combination in restraint of trade or attempted to violate the antitrust laws of the land. It is conceded that there is actual competition between the beet-sugar companies themselves and between them and the refiners. I assert without fear of successful contradiction that, if undisturbed now, with the assurance of permanency as to legislation, with sufficient duty to offset the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, this industry will furnish the most splendid example in this country of the success of the protective policy.

Does anyone marvel that the Sugar Trust and the great refiners are anxious to have this bill passed and wipe out the beet-sugar industry? It may be, and I think it is, with the sugar refiners a case of self-preservation. I for one would prefer to see a duty in conformity with the Republican policy retained and witness the industry grow, as it will grow, until every pound of sugar that is consumed by the American people will be raised on American soil and sold to the consumer under the severe competition which must naturally follow rather than destroy the industry and leave the consumer to the mercy of the trusts.

I come now to the question of whether there is real competition between the beet-sugar people and the refiners. I have pointed out from the record that the refiners were back of the propoganda sent broadcast through the country with the view of creating a popular demand for a repeal of the duty on sugar. This ought in itself to disclose their interest in the legislation, but I desire to show from the record the further fact that there is actual competition. If this can be established, it is an irresistible argument in favor of the encouragement of industry. If competition exists, the duty of Congress to preserve and encourage the industry surely follows. What we need in this country more than anything else, as a solution of our economic problems, is competition.

I will again quote the admissions of the representatives of the Sugar Trust and refiners who were subpœnaed before the Hardwick committee.

Mr. Atkins, the acting president of the American Sugar Refining Co., testified that he was a stockholder in the American

Sugar Refining Co. at the time Mr. Havemeyer commenced his policy of investing in beet-sugar factories. That he disagreed with this policy for the reason that it was building up a competitor and therefore disposed of all his holdings in the company, and did not reinvest until the company adopted the policy of disposing of its beet-sugar holdings. When examined on the question of competition with the beet-sugar people, he testified as follows (Hearings, vol. 1, p. 49):

All that beet sugar comes on the market at a certain season of the year. It is all produced in about three months' time. They all want to market it just as rapidly as possible, and in order to do that they come to the eastern points. California sugar comes into Chicago and Michigan sugar into Buffalo and Pittsburgh and eastern refineries; not only the American Sugar Refining Co., but the others, have to reduce or close down until the beet sugars are out of the way. Any refining that is done between the 1st of October and the 1st of January is done without any profit, and very often at a loss.

I call particular attention to the language of the witness that during the three months when beet sugar is marketed the American Sugar Refining Co. "is forced to reduce or close down until the beet sugars are out of the way." This is certainly a significant fact. It demonstrates that there is effective competition during three months of the year. It is pertinent to inquire what would be the effect if the beet-sugar industry developed so that this competition would exist for half or three-fourths or perhaps all of the year, as I believe it would?

Mr. Gillmore, of Arbuckle Bros., testified as follows (Hearings, vol. 2, pp. 1158, 1159):

Mr. RAKER. This beet-sugar industry, and the competition between that and you, is more of an imagination than it is of a reality, is it not?
Mr. GILLMORE. No; I think it is an actuality.
Mr. RAKER. Can you name any concrete case of place or time when you came into actual competition; in other words, when you found the beet sugar in the same point where you were handling your cane sugar?
Mr. GILLMORE. In the last two years, very seriously, in Pittsburgh, Pa.
Mr. RAKER. The beet-sugar people got in Pittsburgh, Pa.?
Mr. GILLMORE. Yes.
Mr. RAKER. From where?
Mr. GILLMORE. I do not know where from. I do not know what the brand was, or anything about it. I know the fact.
Mr. RAKER. What time of the year was it?
Mr. GILLMORE. I know that it was so much so that a house owned by Arbuckle Bros. there was compelled to take the beet-sugar business in and buy it and sell in competition. That is bringing coals home to Newcastle.

I agree with the witness that it was "bringing coals home to Newcastle" when the great house of Arbuckle Bros. was compelled to buy beet sugar and sell it through one of their own branches.

Mr. Jamison, of Arbuckle Bros., says, in substance, that Michigan sugar has interfered with them very largely in Ohio and Pennsylvania and has been down as far as New York and West Virginia. (Hearings, vol. 2, p. 1193.)

Robert M. Parker, president of the Brooklyn Cooperage Co., owned by the American Sugar Refining Co., and a director of the latter company, says (Hearings, vol. 2, pp. 1463–1464):

Mr. MALBY. Does the American Sugar Refining Co. at the present time ship any granulated sugar to the various States in the Mississippi Valley and in the Missouri region?
Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; a very great deal.
Mr. MALBY. And at all times of the year?
Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; until the price is so low that it is impossible to ship at a profit.
Mr. MALBY. Who makes the prices low, or creates the condition to which you refer?
Mr. PARKER. The San Francisco cane and the beet sugars from Colorado and Utah and Michigan.

Here is the vital admission that the beet-sugar product makes "the prices so low" that the refiners can not compete in the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys. In other words, that the people of the Missouri and Mississippi Valleys get the benefit of prices fixed by a competition that drives the American Sugar Refining Co. out of the territory so long as beet sugar lasts.

Mr. Spreckels, of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., testified as follows (Hearings, vol. 3, p. 2269):

Mr. HINDS. Can you tell me how far in the East the beet-sugar people are able to market their sugar?
Mr. SPRECKELS. There is the dividing line on the Missouri River. They sometimes come as far as Pittsburgh. I think the American Beet Sugar Co. has come once as far as New York.
Mr. HINDS. Are they showing a tendency to come farther east all the time?
Mr. SPRECKELS. They are.
Mr. HINDS. And make the competition severer, if it is competition?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes.
Mr. HINDS. Continually?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes, sir. They have frequently come as far as Pittsburgh.

Is it any wonder that Mr. Spreckels was willing to contribute $12,000 for circularizing the people with a view of driving out this competition through legislation?

In fact, every representative of the sugar refiners who appeared before the Hardwick committee was forced to admit that beet sugar furnished an active and severe competition. That it has been extending, even encroaching on the East, within the very shadow of the refineries themselves.

But I pass from the admission of the refiners to consider it from another angle. Mr. Willett, of Willett & Gray, publishers of the Weekly Statistical Trade Journal on Sugar, appeared before the committee.

He was engaged by the committee as an expert, and his opinion should therefore carry great weight. He is regarded as the greatest expert in this country if not in the world. I will only refer to the gist of his testimony, which may be summed up in the following question and answer relative to the rapid rise in sugar last summer and fall and the reason for its decline:

Mr. FORDNEY. The beet-sugar industry has certainly had a beneficial influence upon the price of sugar.
Mr. WILETT. Yes; an enormous influence. If it were not for the domestic sugar industry sugars in this country would be to-day very considerably higher. I would not be surprised if it would not be a cent a pound more but for the beet and cane sugar produced in this country.

And again:

There is no question whatever, Mr. Chairman, that the coming into the market in October of the Michigan sugars and other domestic sugars dropped the price from 6.57 in October down to 6.11 in November and in December to 5.63.

This is the expert employed by the committee, one trained in the sugar market, who unqualifiedly says that it was the beet sugar which reduced the price of sugar about a cent a pound.

Willett & Gray's Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal of September 23, 1911, has this to say:

Already the citizens of the States in which beet-sugar factories are located are being granted concessions in prices from those of States that must find their sugar supplies from the world's markets. It is somewhat beyond our present understanding to realize what high prices would have to be paid for sugar in all the States if our 500,000-ton beet factories were not in existence with the present world conditions of unknown short supplies supplemented by a strong and aggressive syndicate speculation in Europe.

There is no higher authority in this country on the question of sugar prices and market conditions than Willett & Gray, and what they say is entitled to great weight.

Let us take the question of competition from another angle and see just where beet sugar is sold. The following table taken from the hearings shows the distribution of the Michigan Sugar Co. for the past five years:

It appears from this statement that the beet sugar of Colorado has entered the markets of Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Ohio, and Pennsylvania; that the beet-sugar industry has been extending its market to the East year by year. No wonder the refiners are alarmed over their control of the markets.

Last summer on the reported shortage in the beet sugar of Europe the sugar refiners made an advance of from 1⅛ to 2½ cents per pound, and at the time they did so they were using the raw sugar for which they had contracted at the low prices prevailing prior to the reported shortage. Arbuckle Bros. advanced the price of sugar at one time to 7½ cents per pound f. o. b. New York. The high prices prevailed during the months of July, August, September, and October, and during all of that time the refiners were making a profit of at least 2 cents per pound above what would be considered a reasonable profit.

Two cents per pound is on the basis of $7 per barrel. We are consuming in this country about 75,000 barrels per day, so that they were exacting of the people about $500,000 per day during this period because they had the control of the market, the very thing they are striving to secure permanently by the destruction of the beet-sugar industry.

They maintained their high prices until the American beet sugar came on the market in October. There had been no change so far as the world's output or market were concerned, but they were then compelled to meet beet-sugar prices.

There is a beet-sugar factory in Waverly, in my district. I have it on the authority of the manager that no beet sugar was sold in Iowa at a higher figure than 5.78½, and this was considerably less than the prices charged by the refiners.

At this point it might be interesting to quote once more from Mr. Lowry, who has been posing in his circulars as a friend of the consumer, who, after telling the history of jumping the price of sugar from 5 to 7.25, admitted that it was their policy (the Federal Sugar Refining Co.) to exact "all the traffic would bear."

For the purpose of showing the actual facts—that is to say, the prices at which the refiners sold sugar during the months of September, October, and November, and also the prices at which the beet-sugar factories sold their output—I will insert some tables taken from the hearings before the Hardwick committee. These tables show that beet sugar was sold at considerably less than the prices fixed by the refiners. (Hearings, p. 656.) The following table shows the prices of the refiners for the months of August, September, and October.

These figures speak for themselves, and they show beyond a possibility of contradiction two vital facts: First, that the beet-sugar industry furnishes an active and effective competition against the refiners; second, they have lowered the prices of sugar to the consumer.

And now I come to the consumer who has caused the sugar refiners so much solicitude. The Mr. Lowry, to whom I have referred, in one of his remarkable circulars figured that the duty added 2 cents per pound to the price of sugar, from which he computed that every family of five persons, on the basis of 80 pounds per capita, pays $8 per year on account of the duty. This is a fair sample of his utter disregard of facts, or, I might say, of his deliberate intention to deceive.

Others have taken 1.90, the present duty on refined sugar, as the basis for their computation, and have added the entire amount of the duty to the cost of sugar. These statements are erroneous in the very nature of the case. In the first place there is only a negligible quantity of refined sugar imported. In the year 1910 the importation of refined sugar amounted to only 1,405 tons, so that it is manifestly unfair and misleading to take the duty on refined sugar as a basis.

The duty on refined sugar is 1.90. The duty on raw sugar is 1.68½. There is a 20 per cent reduction to Cuba, which leaves the Cuban duty 1.348. The large per cent of our importations of raw sugar come from Cuba. The effective duty is the duty actually collected on dutiable sugar.

During the year 1911 there was 3,899,932,335.08 pounds of dutiable sugar imported into the United States. The duty collected was $51,496,559.12, which makes the average duty collected per 100 pounds of dutiable sugar $1.3461.

The gentlemen who made the computations I have referred to have made another serious mistake. They have taken the total per capita consumption as a basis and have assumed that all of the sugar consumed will be affected by the removal of the duty. This is not true. They failed to consider the large amount—in fact, the greater portion—used other than on the table. It enters into many varieties of products. Here are some of the articles in which it is used: Condensed milk, candies, etc., chewing gum, corn products, liquors and wines, preserves, soda-water sirups, desiccated coconuts, Quaker oats, jelly, gelatin, etc., candied fruits, rock candy and rock-candy sirups, drugs, medicines, chemicals, cocoa, ice cream, infants' food, fruit sirups, mincemeat, ginger ale, biscuits, crackers, and bakery articles. In all of these and many others sugar is used, and it is all included in the total amount consumed, on which the per capita consumption is figured.

It is estimated that 140,000,000 pounds of sugar is used annually in condensed milk. On a basis of 4½ cents a pound there is about 1⅛ cents' worth of sugar in a pound of condensed milk, and if the price were lowered 1 cent a pound it would make a difference of two-fifths of a cent on a 15-cent can. Would the consumer receive the benefit of this reduction of two-fifths cent per can? One hundred and twenty-six million pounds are used annually by the biscuit, pie, and cake bakers. About 612,000,000 pounds are used by confectioners. Twenty-five million pounds are used in making chewing gum. No one can seriously claim that the consumer will receive any concession either in the price or as to the quantity in any of the articles into which sugar enters.

This phase of the question, as well as the percentage of the total amount of sugar consumed that actually enters the home for use on the table, is so rarely discussed, while at the same time has such an important bearing, that I will quote from the testimony of Mr. Horace Havemeyer before the Hardwick committee. Mr. Havemeyer was the sales agent of the American Sugar Refining Co., and therefore in a position not only to impart information, but to form a fair estimate as to the relative uses of sugar (Hearings, vol. 1, p. 612):

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Havemeyer, do you know anything about how much of the 80 or 90 pounds of sugar per capita is consumed in this country directly in sugar by the people of this country and how much goes into manufacture?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. That is a very difficult question to answer. I know it in a general way. There is a great deal of sugar used in various articles of manufacture. Take condensed milk, crackers, jelly, preserves of all kinds, tobacco, whisky, chewing gum, candy, and a great many other things that you would not think of at the moment. I should estimate of the 80 pounds that is annually consumed that about 50 pounds goes into sugar-containing manufactured products and that about 30 goes to the consumer and is used on his table direct.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then the price of sugar in chewing gum would not make very much difference to the consumer, would it?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. I understand that chewing gum consists of 75 per cent sugar, and the sugar in it is sold for from 50 cents to $1.50 a pound, while the refiner's price for sugar is about 5 cents, or a little less.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is, in chewing gum?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. Yes; it is sold at from 50 cents to $1.50 a pound.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then sugar is a pretty small portion of the price of chewing gum.

I only wanted to get, Mr. Havemeyer, an idea of about how much sugar directly is consumed by the people of the country outside of that in manufactured articles.

Mr. HAVEMEYER. I should say 30 pounds per capita. I do not believe there is anyone who can give you those figures to a dot. I do not believe there are any statistics which could prove that. It is an estimate. I have thought over it a great deal because, being a salesman of the American Sugar Refining Co., I naturally had more charge of that end of the business than any other.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then the consumers of these manufactured articles are not very much interested as to which way the price of sugar goes, inasmuch as sugar is such a small item of the cost?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. Sugar is infinitesimal in all those items—very small.

As Mr. Havemeyer well observes, the price of sugar that enters into these articles is infinitesimal, although the aggregate use is large. While Mr. Havemeyer places the amount which is used on the table at about 30 pounds per capita, it is fair to state that the British Board of Trade, in their recent report on conditions in America as well as in England, state that there is about 5¼ pounds used on the table of the average American family per week. On the basis stated by the English Board of Trade, it would amount to 54 pounds per capita; and if the full amount of the effective duty (1⅛ cents per pound) were added to the price, it would mean 72 cents a year per capita, or 6 cents per month. If we take the basis of Mr. Havemeyer, or 30 pounds per capita, it would be 40 cents per year, or 3½ cents per month. If we take the average between the amount fixed by Mr. Havemeyer and that fixed by the British Board of Trade, it would mean 56 cents per year, or about 4⅔ cents per month, and this is conceding, for the purpose of argument merely, that the amount of the effective duty, that is to say the duty actually collected on dutiable sugar, would be added to the price.

I do not believe that the removal of the duty will lower the price of sugar. It may temporarily, but in the end, I doubt it. If we destroy the beet-sugar industry, which gives real competition to the beet-sugar refiners, and destroy our domestic cane sugar, the refiners will then have a monopoly, and they will do exactly as they did last summer and fall—in the language of Mr. Lowry, "Exact all the traffic will bear."

The Hardwick committee report that the price of sugar is lower in this country than in any European country except England. In the year 1910 the average price of sugar was about nine-tenths of a cent less in England than in this country. It is relatively lower in this country than in England, when you consider the wages paid in the two countries—that is to say, the purchasing power of labor. A day's wage in this country will purchase forty-three and a fraction pounds of sugar, while a day's wage in England will purchase twenty-one and a fraction pounds of sugar. In other words, a day's wage in this country will purchase twice as much sugar as a day's wage in England.

It is a well-known fact that from 1890 to 1907 there was a material rise in the price of nearly all food products. Sugar is one of the exceptions. If we are looking for an illustration of how a few men can control the market when an article is on the free list and there is no home competition, it is necessary to go no further than the house of Arbuckle Bros. and the way they have boosted the price of coffee during the past two or three years, and these are the men who are now clamoring for either free sugar or a duty so low as to destroy the beet-sugar industry.

But will the removal of the duty give us lower sugar? In December, 1903, Cuban reciprocity went into effect, granting a reduction of 20 per cent on sugar to Cuba, and if the argument holds good, there should have been a reduction of 20 per cent in the price of sugar. The Statistical Abstract for 1910, on page 713, gives the wholesale price of granulated sugar at New York, per pound, as follows:

It will be noted that in only one year has sugar been lower than it was in 1903, and that one year only twelve one-hundredths of a cent per pound. On page 44 of the hearings is a table giving the New York market price from 1870 to 1909, inclusive. It is interesting to note that the price of sugar drops from 13.51 cents per pound in 1870 to 4.76 cents per pound in 1909, and it is also interesting to note that the price of sugar during the few years when it was on the free list was only about one-fifth of a cent a pound less than during the six years when the full Dingley tariff was operative.

Economic conditions, however, have changed since then. In those days we were not confronted with the trust problem that now confronts us, and with no production in this country we would stand a good chance of having permanently the same conditions we had last fall when the sugar refiners shot the price up as high as 7½ cents per pound.

Mr. Willett, the expert employed by the Hardwick committee, who has made a life study of the sugar question, and particularly its relation to prices, sums up his entire testimony and his investigation and study of the subject as follows:

In all these analyses I reach the same conclusion, that to decrease the price of sugar to the consumer, increase the domestic production as rapidly as possible.

This conclusion appears on page 3978 of the hearings—the last page—and it was very fittingly placed there, for it sums up in one sentence what the entire hearings for 11 weeks, conducted by able men, with the power of the Government back of them, establishes beyond dispute, that the consumer can only be protected by the increase in home production.

There are now 71 beet-sugar factories in the United States actively engaged in refining sugar, with an estimated cost of construction of about $100,000,000. They pay out for beets, fuel, salaries, wages, and for other items about $45,000,000 per year, every dollar being paid out in this country.

I do not believe that any fair-minded consumer or laboring man will wish to destroy this industry, throw out of employment the wage earners who are engaged in it, and take the chance of putting themselves in the clutches of the Sugar Trust and refiners for the small advantage, conceding everything that can be claimed, that they might temporarily receive.

It is unnecessary to discuss the effect of this measure on the beet-sugar industry. That it will be destroyed is conceded. The majority make no effort to conceal this fact. They are frank about it and are entitled to credit for their frankness. Some Republicans who have expressed their intention of voting for the measure admit it will destroy the beet-sugar industry and openly affirm that it ought to be destroyed, while others, in an effort to square themselves with the Republican platform on which they were elected, express the opinion that it will not injure the beet-sugar industry, and find refuge behind some quotations in favor of free sugar, expressed by Republican leaders a quarter of a century ago. The conditions which justified free sugar then do not exist now. Since then the beet-sugar industry has developed and is furnishing actual competition for the refiners. It is growing and the competition becoming severer each year. They forget that the Republican Party adjudicated that question in 1896, as I have shown from the platform adopted that year—the platform upon which William McKinley was a candidate for President and which represented the best thought of the Republican leaders of that time, and a policy that has never been retracted by any Republican leader since, and stands to-day as the definitely announced policy of the party.

On the question of the effect of this measure on the beet-sugar industry I will quote from the report of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, as follows:

In the report of the same investigating committee (p. 22) we find that the cost of manufacturing beet sugar is lowest in Germany, and according to the best-known sugar experts the cost of producing a pound of raw sugar there ranged from 1.96 to 2.07 cents. Adding a refining cost of four-tenths of a cent per pound, the cost of producing refined beet sugar in Germany would average 2.415 cents per pound. The average cost of producing beet sugar as computed from the returns of the 11 plants in which the American Sugar Refining Co. is interested is shown not to exceed 3.54 cents per pound. This difference between the German and American costs more than offsets the freight charges from Germany to the United States.

In brief, the committee finds that it costs 1.12½ cents more per pound to produce beet sugar in the United States than in Germany. The freight rate from Hamburg to New York is 12 cents per 100 pounds, or twelve one-hundredths cent per pound, so that, according to the figures of the committee, it will be impossible for the beet-sugar industry of this country to compete with Germany. Moreover, the figures cited in this country do not include selling expense, which includes brokerage, insurance, storage, and so forth, nor interest on the investment, nor depreciation. The figures stated by the committee are taken from the testimony of Mr. Freeman, and a reference to his testimony on page 2379 of the hearings will confirm my statement.

Therefore those who vote to have this bill become a law do so with the knowledge in advance of its effect on the beet-sugar industry.

I will refer briefly to the relationship between the Sugar Trust and the beet-sugar companies. When Mr. Havemeyer was at the head of the American Sugar Refining Co. he started the policy of investing in beet-sugar factories. At the time he did this Mr. Atkins, now acting president of the American Sugar Refining Co., who was at that time a large stockholder in the American Sugar Co., differed with Mr. Havemeyer as to the policy, on the ground that it was building up a competitor for the refiners, and therefore sold all the stock he held in the American Sugar Refining Co. Afterwards others who were interested in the American Sugar Refining Co. discovered that Mr. Atkins was right and that the beet-sugar industry was developing into a dangerous competitor. This policy of the company was then reversed. The Hardwick committee in its report says:

Since 1907 new influences have controlled the company, and the testimony does not show a continuance of the policy of investing in competing concerns, but does show that some of the properties previously acquired have been sold.

The company has sold all of its stock in beet-sugar factories that was listed on the market. Speaking of the sale of its entire holdings in the American Beet Sugar Co., Mr. Atkins testified:

That stock was all sold, because it was a listed stock and there was a market for it. We have not got a share of it now.

Since the new policy was adopted the American Sugar Refining Co. has disposed from time to time of its holdings in various companies and recently sold its entire holdings in the Carver County Sugar Co., in Minnesota.

The report of the Hardwick committee states that the American Sugar Refining Co. owns 41 per cent of the stock of 11 companies, but it also states that as to the remaining beet-sugar companies "they are real competitors of the American Sugar Refining Co." If the suit of the Government now pending in the courts is sustained, it will compel the American Sugar Refining Co. to dispose of its entire holdings in beet-sugar companies.

There is this observation, however, that after the Hardwick committee had conducted its hearings for 11 weeks and made an exhaustive examination of the whole subject, that nowhere is it claimed by the committee that the American Sugar Refining Co. has controlled the selling price of the beet-sugar factories in which it was interested.

It is singular that one of the most important phases of the subject is seldom mentioned, and that is the indirect benefits of sugar-beet culture.

During the past few years the question of increasing our yield has been widely discussed. Our Government is spending millions of dollars in this cause. Nearly every State is doing the same thing. I am in hearty accord with what has been done and in sympathy with any movement that will improve agricultural conditions, and this is one of the reasons why I am opposed to the present measure.

There is perhaps no more practical, efficient, or economical method of increasing our production than encouraging the raising of sugar beets. It is no longer a matter of theory or speculation. It rests on facts ascertained by actual experience. We know what it has done for France. We know what it has done for Germany. We know what it has done in the sections of this country where beet-sugar factories have been located. We know what the Agricultural Department says about it, and perhaps there is no more ardent advocate of beet-sugar culture than the Agricultural Department. We know what our leading agricultural scientists say about it. All concur in the great benefits derived from raising sugar beets through the increased yield of other crops. Dr. Wiley, when he was before the Hardwick committee, said:

I believe it (referring to beet sugar) would be one of the best things for the agriculture of this country that could possibly exist.

In Germany, where the soil has been tilled since the time of the Roman invasion, they are to-day producing greater yields per acre than they are in the United States, where our soil may yet be termed almost virgin. They are raising more in Germany than we are on the black loam soil of Iowa, the best agricultural State in the Union. Here is a table showing the German acreage and yield of the five principal crops in 1910:

	Acreage.	Bushels.	Per cent.
Wheat	4,800,900	141,884,000	29.5
Oats	10,599,100	544,287,000	51.3
Barley	3,880,500	133,330,000	24.3
Rye	15,287,500	413,802,000	27.0
Potatoes	8,209,621	1,715,676,300	208.9

The following table was compiled from the Agricultural Yearbook and gives the average yield and value of the same crops in Iowa in 1910:

	Acres.	Bushels.	Yield per acre.	Value per bushel Dec. 1.	Value of crops.
					Per acre.	For the State.
			Bushels.	Cents.
Wheat	530,000	11,131,000	21.0	85	$17.85	$9,462,000
Oats	4,800,000	181,440,000	37.8	27	10.21	48,989,000
Barley	510,000	15,045,000	29.5	56	16.52	8,425,000
Rye	32,000	592,000	18.5	64	11.84	379,000
Potatoes	170,000	12,240,000	72.0	60	43.20	7,344,000
Total	6,042,000	220,448,000	.....	.....	.....	74,590,000

The following table shows the yield and the value of yield of a like acreage in Germany—that is to say, the same number of acres used in Iowa for the five crops stated—based on United States farm value of products:

	Acres.	Bushels.	Yield per acre.	Value per bushel Dec. 1.	Value of crops.
					Per acre.	For the State.
			Bushels.	Cents.
Wheat	530,000	15,635,000	29.5	85	$25.07	$13,289,000
Oats	4,800,000	246,240,000	51.3	27	13.85	66,484,800
Barley	510,000	17,493,000	34.3	56	19.20	9,796,080
Rye	32,000	864,000	27.0	64	17.28	552,960
Potatoes	170,000	35,513,000	208.9	60	125.34	21,307,800

It will be seen from the foregoing table that if we had raised in Iowa as much per acre as was raised in Germany, the farmers of Iowa would have received $36,800,000 more for these five crops.

Those who have investigated the conditions in Germany assert and establish that the increased yield in Germany is due largely to the raising of sugar beets and the rotation of their crops. Although the German farmers do not realize as much for their beets as American farmers do, and make less profit out of it, they are nevertheless willing to plant for the indirect benefit which they receive in the increased yield of other crops. The experience in Germany in this respect is found true in this country. H. C. Wallace, one of the editors of the Wallace Farmer, published in Des Moines, Iowa, one of the best agricultural papers in the entire country, published a serial article last December on the subject of the sugar beet in Iowa after he had made a visit to the factory of the Iowa Sugar Co., at Waverly, and talked personally with the farmers who were raising sugar beets. Here is a brief quotation from his article:

It is interesting to note that of the ten or a dozen farmers to whom I talked who had grown sugar beets for the past several years all agreed unanimously that the yield of small grain grown after sugar beets was greatly increased.

He closed his article with the following significant statement:

The culture of sugar beets, as it spreads, will revolutionize the agriculture of the northern part of the corn belt.

The Secretary of Agriculture states that there are 274,000,000 acres of land in this country suitable for raising beets. There is no reason why we should not produce every pound of sugar we consume. With the progress of the industry and the improvements which experience have brought about beet sugar has shown a decreasing cost of production, and there is reason to believe that with its further development there will be a further decrease, and the people will receive the direct benefit of prices fixed by actual competition. Besides, we will receive the indirect benefit of increased production of other farm products, which has its relation to the prices of such products, influenced always by the law of supply and demand.

While I am opposed to the present measure, I would favor a revision of this schedule that would remove the Dutch standard test and the preferential on refined sugar, and fix the duty in accordance with the measure of protection for which the Republican Party stands—the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. This measure has no chance of becoming a law. This fact was well understood when it was introduced. It is purely political buncombe. It has met the just criticism of the Democratic press. The Washington Times, a prominent Democratic paper, that has been making a fight for the last two or three years for a revision of the sugar schedule, and particularly on the Dutch standard test, criticizes this bill in severest language. In its issue of March 2 in its editorial columns it says:

All that is good politics, as it is played, but it is not dealing fairly with the people. The insincerity of the House project is proved by the fact that for months the Democrats have been utterly unable to agree what should be done about sugar. So long as they considered plans that were intended to have a chance of becoming law and giving the people some real advantage, they were hopelessly unable to agree. It was only on a fantastic proposal that could not possibly have a ghost of a show of enactment that they could get together.

And in its issue of March 3, in another editorial, severely attacking the measure, it states as follows:

From the beginning the present Ways and Means Committee has pretended to favor moderate, gradual tariff changes. It would not have free wool, lest that ruin an industry. Yet it turns squarely around and proposes free sugar, absolutely certain to ruin an industry, if free sugar should come.

There is gratification in the knowledge that some Democrats declined to accept the buncombe free-sugar income-tax plan, and have announced their purpose to expose the cheap plot. The Democrats can not afford to play so flimsy a game, and if they go ahead with it, they will discover that the people are a deal wiser than the framers of this plot imagine them to be. The project that is intended to satisfy everybody will be found to satisfy and to fool nobody.

Mr. Charles W. Miller, of Iowa, for three terms a Democratic member of the State Legislature of Iowa, and for several years chairman of the Democratic State central committee, concludes a long article, published in the Waterloo Times-Tribune—a Democratic paper—upon the subject, which I will print as an appendix, but whose view of the measure is summed up in the following sentence:

All things considered, I have decided that there are occasions when even a fundamental free trader can consistently oppose tariff reduction, and that this is one of them.

In brief, this measure will fool no one. It certainly is in violation of Republican doctrine, and is even claimed by Democrats to be a violation of the policy of gradual revision downward, of the Democratic Party.

Supplemental to the letter of Mr. Miller I will insert a letter from Mr. George E. Lichty, published in the Waterloo Evening Courier, written to Mr. Miller in response to the above article. Mr. Lichty is president of Smith, Lichty & Hilman, wholesale grocers, of Waterloo, Iowa, and a member of the executive committee of the National Wholesale Grocers' Association. I insert it because of his high standing in commercial circles, because he knows the subject, and for the further reason of showing how the real wholesale grocers feel in respect to the measure, as distinguished from the fictitious committee represented by Mr. Lowry, the employee of the refiners.

In conclusion, I have endeavored to review the questions involved in this measure fairly, confining myself almost wholly to the facts developed before the Hardwick committee, a committee created at the instance of the majority party in the House, and its work at all times under the control of the Democratic Members who comprised a majority thereof. I bear willing testimony to the ability with which the committee performed its work. The report of the committee is unanimous. The hearings and the report establish the propositions I have advanced.

APPENDIX.

[Public letter written by Mr. C. W. Miller, of Waverly, Iowa.]

WAVERLY, IOWA, February 12.

"Greater Iowa" is a slogan that appears to be in everybody's mouth these days, and indicating, as it does, a State-wide desire on the part of our people to push Iowa forward to a front place in the galaxy of American Commonwealths, a place to which her natural endowments richly entitle her, it seems probable that some good must result therefrom.

But since in all of the discussion there seems to be a dearth of suggestion as to ways and means, I am tempted to submit something along that line and invite attention to the fact that an industry at Waverly is pointing the way to at least one avenue by which Iowa may add much to her population, wealth, and general prosperity.

Before proceeding to my elucidation, however, let me suggest that Iowa at the present time has all the people necessary to do the work that comes to their hands, and the unusual amount of poverty in our cities the present winter indicates that we have some to spare.

This being indisputable, as it manifestly is, it follows that the first step in the direction of a greater Iowa must be in the way of more jobs. Manifestly also, these jobs must almost necessarily relate to the soil in comparison with which all other sources of wealth in this State must ever be infinitesimally small.

An industry born of the soil, therefore, which combines the benefaction of multiplying jobs with that of "making two blades of grass grow where there grew but one before" would seem to fit into Iowa's plan for a greater future as nothing else could do and merit the special attention and consideration of every loyal Iowan in sympathy with the booster movement.

Such an industry is the beet-sugar industry, which, barring the possibility of adverse tariff legislation, may now be counted, not only as a permanent Iowa institution, but also as the forerunner of many similar establishments throughout the northern counties of the State.

That the Waverly beet-sugar factory is a veritable prosperity breeder is well known to the people of this section of the State, but that others may know what a stream of wealth it pours into the channels of industry and trade I cite the amounts in round numbers which were disbursed by its treasurer during the "campaign" just brought to a close, giving also the purposes for which they were applied:

Beet tonnage	$240,000
Freight	34,000
Securing and transporting laborers	7,000
Superintendency	13,999
Receiving and taring	9,000
Factory labor	71,000
Office salaries and office expenses	15,000
Barrels and bags	10,000
Coke	2,000
Limestone	5,000
Additions and repairs	41,000
Miscellaneous	8,000
Total	455,000

I have no doubt that these figures will be a revelation to many before whose eyes they will come, and if they wonder thereat I know their wonder will grow when I tell them that all of these substantial sums, along with the modest profit of the sugar company, were, primarily, wrung from 4,806 acres of land, or an area of but slightly in excess of one-fifth of a single township.

But this isn't the end of my prosperity story by any means. The most important addition to it is that next year, as demonstrated by the experience of former years, every one of these acres is destined to give a yield of 25 to 50 per cent in excess of an average crop of grain, this being a direct result of the deep plowing, intensive cultivation, and weed extermination incident to the beet crop of the year before.

Nor is it necessary to stop here in enumerating the rewards of the beet grower, for in the beet tops he has a fodder of an estimated value of from $8 to $10 per acre. These tops, however, if left in the field, restore most of the plant nourishment that has been taken from it, and if the beet pulp could also be restored in its entirety the soil would be just about even, since sugar has no value as a plant food, and, in fact, is not so much a product of the soil as of the air and sunshine. The beet pulp, however, has a great value as a food for cattle, and none is permitted to go to waste. Beet growers in the neighborhood of the factory have access to it without expense to them, and for the past three winters J. H. Letts, of Letts, Iowa, has drawn upon it for the fattening of several hundred steers, kept in yards adjoining the factory.

Another valuable by-product of the factory is the lime cake which results from the vast quantities of lime used in the purifying process. It has a distinct value as a fertilizer, and is especially valuable for the correction of soil acidity.

IOWA SOIL IDEAL.

That northern Iowa soil and climate are well adapted to profitable sugar-beet culture is now assured beyond a doubt, but the early years of the factory's existence were uncertain and troublous. Farmers were slow to take hold of the proposition, and to secure acreage was a task both expensive and arduous. The first season's crop was satisfactory only here and there, but it was observed that the German farmers who had had experience on their native soil got splendid returns. Profiting by this demonstration, after the second year the company arranged to provide reluctant growers with field workers of experience. These were found in the cities of adjoining States, being mainly German-Russian families lately arrived from the beet-growing sections of their native country. The rewards offered in the Iowa beet fields were so much greater than they had been accustomed to that they were easily persuaded to exchange their slum environment for the fresh air and sunshine of Iowa farms. A large percentage of these families have found permanent homes in the localities where they were employed, and not a few, gratified at the results of their labor for others, have bought or rented small pieces of land. The other day Secretary Moore showed me 21 contracts signed by the heads of such families who, for the first time in their existence, are going to experience the delight of not having a landlord over them. They are prodigious workers, thrifty, fairly intelligent, and law-abiding, and that they will make good citizens in their new environment is beyond question.

What the ultimate destiny of these impressionable children of the Old World would have been were they left in the haunts of vice from which they were taken admits of enough doubt to make me secure in counting some measure of benefit to our social condition as yet another benign attribute of the beet-sugar industry.

And still another incidental benefit of this industry is the solving of the hired-man problem. The beet workers above alluded to are skilled farm laborers and they are not afraid of work. Neither do they make it a condition of their employment that they be provided with a horse and buggy to go gallivanting o'nights. During the haying, the oat harvest, and the corn husking the beet fields do not require their attention, and during these periods the farmers in the sugar-beet sections are never up a stump for help, as they so frequently were before the advent of this new industry.

SOME OF THE BENEFITS.

As to the benefit conferred upon the soil by sugar-beet culture I have previously alluded, but my attention has been called to a specific case which I believe is worthy of particular mention. Two years ago last fall Moses Ackles, a successful Michigan grower, went to Osage to grow beets for the Waverly factory. After he had rented a 94-acre tract of land for the purpose he learned that it had been in the hands of a long series of renters and was badly run down; also that it was seriously afflicted with quack grass. Nothing daunted he went ahead and raised a crop of beets, securing 9 tons to the acre. The following year, 1911, he seeded it down to clover, planting a cover crop of oats. The oats yielded 50 bushels an acre, topping anything in the neighborhood, and later he cut what proved to be the only good stand of clover in Mitchell County. One thousand dollars was offered but refused for it. Another reward was the complete elimination of the quack grass.

If the incidental rewards of a sugar-beet crop are taken into consideration, 7 or 8 tons per acre may be regarded as better than the return of an average corn crop, but that such a yield can readily be doubled is shown by the results attained by the following widely scattered growers:

	Acres.	Tons per acre.
A. R. Stokes, Clear Lake	20.71	16.40
W. D. Rung, Osage	83.71	15.14
F. M. Williams, Steamboat Rock	33.59	14.63
J. S. Besterby, Ottoson	32.62	12.76
L. L. Latham, Kanawha	18.58	14.55
Nat P. Ellis, Waverly	18	17

It will be observed that the above were all large growers. Some of the smaller growers secured even a larger tonnage per acre, and Lee Campbell, of Osage, makes affidavit to the remarkable yield of over 28 tons from a measured acre.

TONNAGE INCREASES.

The fact that tonnage per acre has increased year by year until last year it was better than 50 per cent better than the first year beets were grown here shows what increased knowledge of beet culture has accomplished. The campaign of education and supervision has been an expensive one, however, and along with the expense of securing acreage, has dug deep into what might otherwise have been added to the company's profits, but the fact that the necessary acreage for next season was secured practically without solicitation shows that sugar-beet culture in northern Iowa is past the experimental stage, and that it now would be no difficult matter to secure tonnage enough to operate several factories of the capacity of that at Waverly.

On the horizon of this promising industry there is now but one cloud, but that is rather an ominous one. It takes the shape of an energetic and well-financed propaganda on the part of the refiners to take the tariff off of raw sugar. Ostensibly this propaganda is conducted by a "committee of wholesale grocers" and in the interest of the consumers, but one day while I was present at the Hardwick committee investigation in Washington I saw a witness put through a sweating process that brought out the illuminating fact that he in himself constituted this entire committee, and that the refiners had put up every dollar for the tons of literature with which the country has been flooded. When I learned that this gentleman was Frank C. Lowry, sales agent of the Federal Spreckels Refining Co., I began to suspect that refiners not only expect to reap the full financial benefit of the proposed tariff reduction, the immense sum of $50,000,000, which is now collected by the Government, but that their still greater ambition is to be able to manipulate prices so as to destroy or at least check the competition of domestic sugar, grown from a production of 40,000 to 600,000 tons since 1896 and which undersells the refinery product every day in the year. Another important disclosure at the hearing was that Arbuckle Bros., who now have the country by the throat with reference to coffee, are leaders in the fight for free raw sugar, undoubtedly with the expectation of eventually inaugurating a second process of high-handed robbery upon the consuming public. All things considered, I have decided that there are occasions when even a fundamental free trader can consistently oppose tariff reduction and that this is one of them. But aside from my personal views as to this matter, and because I feel that the beet-sugar industry of Iowa could not withstand the assaults the refiners would make upon it, I feel that the people of this State should be advised of its present status and future possibilities, and for that purpose this article is penned.

(Public letter of Mr. George E. Lichty to Mr. Miller.)

DEAR MR. MILLER: I read your article on the beet-sugar situation in Iowa, and I want to congratulate you on the splendid manner in which the same was presented.

For a long time I have known something of the so-called Wholesale Grocers' Association, which, in fact, almost entirely means Frank C. Lowrey and Arbuckle Bros. When western wholesale grocers, however, attempted to explain the situation and to contend that they were not a part of the organization they immediately became objects of suspicion. Your article, I am pleased to state, relieves the jobber of that embarrassment.

I believe that when the people thoroughly understand the sugar situation, particularly in the State of Iowa, it will mean that we will produce more sugar than the State of Louisiana and of a quality that will be just as good if not better. The product of the Iowa sugar factory this year has been most satisfactory. We have never sold cane sugar that was any better, and we are only sorry that it is impossible to have the splendid product of the Waverly factory to sell throughout the entire 12 months of the year.

I am writing this to you to say that very few jobbers are in sympathy with the movement you have so thoroughly ventilated.

With personal regards, I am, very truly, yours,

GEO. E. LICHTY.

WATERLOO, February 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired on this paragraph. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOOD. For the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MANN. To the first paragraph?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to the first paragraph, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GOOD. It is on line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not reached that yet. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, and molasses, maple sugar, maple sirup, refined sirups, glucose or grape sugar, and sugar cane shall be admitted free of duty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, after the word "cane," strike out the balance of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "One-half cent per pound: Provided, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1912, and until the 1st day of July 1917, there shall be paid from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to the producers of sugar testing not less than 96° by the polariscope, from beets or sugar cane grown within any of the States of the Union, a bounty of one-half cent per pound: And provided further, That on and after the said 1st day of July, 1917, and for five years thereafter, the said bounty shall be reduced to one-quarter of 1 cent per pound, and after the expiration of said five years no further bounty shall be paid. Said bounty shall be paid under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be admitted by all candid-thinking men that if the bill is passed without amendment the result will be that all the beet-sugar factories in the United States will have to suspend operation and go out of business. We have at the present time in the United States 71 beet-sugar factories. They produced this year, in round numbers, something more than a half million tons of sugar. They have been increasing in number and steadily increasing in their output. This increase has not been as rapid as the advocates of this policy in the past had hoped and expected. I confess that I have been disappointed in this development, and yet I believe that there are a great many reasons why we should not so legislate as to entirely wipe out this industry. There are a great many reasons why we should not be dependent entirely upon the foreign supply for the sugar which we must necessarily consume. There is no doubt but what the Sugar Trust is in favor of free sugar. If the beet-sugar industry could be destroyed they would expect to gain an entire monopoly of the sugar trade of the country and thus control its price. The testimony taken before the committee appointed to investigate the Sugar Trust, I think, shows without doubt that the production of beet sugar has had a tendency to keep down the price of sugar to the consumer. The Sugar Trust practically controlled all the supply outside of that made from beets. This evidence shows that each year when the product of the beet-sugar factories was put upon the market the price of sugar to the consumer invariably went down. Before the supply from the beet-sugar factories was put upon the market the Sugar Trust was enabled to control the importation of sugar and to arbitrarily raise the price. No one doubts but what the Sugar Trust could control and would control the cane-sugar product, because that sugar is imported in its raw state. It is not marketable to the dealer or the consumer, but the only buyers are the refiners of sugar, and because the Sugar Trust controls the refining of sugar it can easily be seen why they want the tariff removed so that their raw material will be absolutely free. I know it is claimed that free sugar would permit beet sugar to be imported from Germany and that for this reason the Sugar Trust would not have a monopoly. This would be true if there were an overproduction of sugar, but when we remember that there is seldom a surplus and often a shortage of the world's supply it can easily be seen that even if beet sugar were imported the importers of such sugar, naturally being desirous of obtaining the largest price possible for their product, would raise the price up to the standard fixed by the Sugar Trust. They could do this, because neither the beet-sugar people nor the Sugar Trust would have enough product to supply the market, and as long as there was market enough to take the supply of both beet and cane sugar the beet-sugar importers would naturally raise their price up to the standard fixed by the Sugar Trust just the same as under present conditions the independent refiners of sugar raise their price up to the level of the price fixed by the Sugar Trust.

The Sugar Trust a few years ago purchased considerable stock in some of the beet-sugar factories of this country. Some of this has been disposed of, but some is still owned by the trust. They would be very glad, however, to lose their comparatively small investment in beet-sugar factories if they could drive the beet-sugar producers in America out of the field, if in doing so they could obtain a monopoly of the market. Their profits by such a monopoly in six months would be vastly greater than the losses they would sustain by the destruction of beet-sugar factories, and when we consider that this monopoly would last indefinitely we can easily see why it is that the Sugar Trust is anxious to annihilate the beet-sugar industry of this country. If our beet-sugar factories did nothing else than to have the effect that I believe history shows they have had, of preventing an entire monopoly of the sugar trade by the Sugar Trust, we can well afford to levy a small duty and to pay a small bounty to keep them in existence and to save the American people from the evils that will come from an arbitrary and tyrannical control of the price of sugar by this great monopoly. If the beet-sugar industry were wiped out, we would be dependent entirely upon the foreign sugar for our domestic supply. In case of a war between our country and any foreign nation, particularly if such foreign nation was any one of the great countries that had a reasonably large navy, our supply of sugar would be practically cut off, and we would be absolutely and completely helpless. If not entirely cut off, the dangers of importing sugar across the ocean and bringing it into the United States would be so increased on account of the hazard that the price would go away beyond reason and away beyond the ability of the ordinary citizen to purchase. Many millions of dollars have been invested in beet-sugar factories. It would be an injustice, it seems to me, by one stroke of the legislative pen, to wipe them off of the map. The amendment which I have proposed would give the consumer practically the benefit of free sugar, and at the same time it would save the beet-sugar factories. For five years the bounty would be only one-half cent per pound, for the next five years the bounty would be only one-quarter of 1 cent per pound, and then it would entirely disappear. It is believed that within that time the development of the beet-sugar industry would be such that it would be able to exist without the protecting benefit of this bounty. I am not defending the present sugar schedule. It is not only unfair, but it is absolutely iniquitous. The infamous Dutch standard color test contained in the present law and that has for a great many years been included in the sugar tariff, is, in my judgment, absolutely indefensible and wicked.

By its unjust provisions the effect has been to keep out of the American market a cheaper grade of sugar that the poorer classes of people would have been able to purchase at a reduced price. This grade of sugar is just as good in quality as refined sugar and, for some purposes, perhaps better. It lacks only the color. To deprive our people of the ability to purchase this grade of sugar at a lower price than refined sugar has been an injustice that has been tolerated entirely too long. Since the invention of the polariscope, a scientific method of testing sugar, there has been no possible excuse to retain in the law the old Dutch standard color test. We ought to legislate so as to make the price of sugar to the American consumer just as cheap as possible. At the same time, I believe that it would be unwise to take any step that would place the American consumer of sugar entirely within the grasp of the Sugar Trust, or to drive the producers of American sugar entirely out of business and thus place the American market entirely under the control of foreign producers of sugar. I think we can all agree that the present tariff on sugar is entirely too high, and yet the desirability of developing sugar production in the United States must be admitted by all. This bill is proposed by men who do not expect to see it enacted into law. It is only a politician's move in the great political game. It is known by those who have brought this bill in that it can not become a law in the form in which it is introduced. Indeed, it is doubtful if many of those who are behind it really want to see it enacted into law in the form in which it now is. It is the product of politicians and not of statesmen.

We are presented, however, with a peculiar parliamentary situation. Under the Constitution a bill like this must originate in the House of Representatives. The Senate has no constitutional authority to originate this kind of legislation. It can only consider it after it has passed the House. If, therefore, under the Constitution we are to secure a revision of the sugar schedule, the bill must pass the House before it can be considered in the Senate. Unless some bill revising this schedule does pass the House, the sugar schedule can not be revised. I believe, therefore, that even though the amendment which I have offered, or some similar amendment, be not agreed to here, that those who believe in a revision of the sugar schedule would be justified in voting even for the original bill as introduced, because only in that way can a revision be had and relief be obtained from the iniquity of the present unreasonable and unfair sugar tariff. The only hope of real revision is that the Senate will so amend the bill that it will give the proper and legitimate relief. If the Senate in its consideration of the subject, properly amends the bill, as I believe it will, there is some hope that in conference a result may be reached that will give relief to the American consumer of sugar and at the same time protect the American citizenship from the cruel monopoly of the Sugar Trust and the domination and control of our market by the foreign producers of sugar. For these reasons I shall vote for the bill now pending, even though all amendments are voted down.

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, the sugar question is one in which we are all interested. From the very smallest consumer to the highest sugar magnate all are interested in our sugar supply and in its prices. We have come to be known, and really are, the great sugar-consuming nation of the world. Fully one-fifth of all the world's supply is consumed within our borders. In the year 1911 our actual consumption of this product reached the immense aggregate of 3,351,391 long tons. In comparison with this Great Britain consumes but 1,831,388 tons; France, 653,269 tons; Germany, 1,134,071 tons; and Russia, 1,021,519 tons—showing that we alone consume nearly twice as much as Great Britain and much more than France, Germany and Russia combined. Now, of this large amount which we consume, it is known that nearly one-fourth is produced within the United States proper; that slightly more than one-fourth comes to us from our insular possessions—the Philippines, Hawaii and Porto Rico—and that all of the balance except a small portion—about 200,000 long tons—comes to us from the Island of Cuba. Under our present regulations all of the sugar that comes to us from our insular possessions comes into the country duty free, and what comes to us from the Island of Cuba comes to us subject to only four-fifths of the full duty charged the foreign product; so that all of the sugar that comes into the country bearing full duty—out of the large amount that we consume—is only about one-seventeenth of what we really use. Of the sugar that we ourselves produce about three-eighths is cane and maple—there being but a small quantity of maple, about 8,000 long tons—and the balance is made of the beet.

It will be well for us to remember, too, that in late years—and co-existent with the life of the beet-sugar industry—the prices of sugar have in nowise increased. Varying conditions and different tariff regulations have produced changes in prices; but the prices of sugar, both at wholesale and at retail, are less to-day than they were in 1889, when the beet-sugar industry was really commenced.

OUR CANE-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

While our cane-sugar industry is not and—from the present outlook—never can be of anything like the importance to us that our beet-sugar industry is and will continue to be, nevertheless it is an industry that means much to that portion of the country in which sugar cane can be raised. According to the majority report of the committee, submitted on this bill, nearly 5,000 persons—besides those engaged in the production of material on the plantations, estimated at 60,000 during harvest and 30,000 for the remainder of the year—are given employment through this industry; the average number of wage earners employed during the year being about 4,000 and the remainder being salaried officials and clerks.

From the same report it will be seen that the amount of capital now invested in the industry is upwards of $36,000,000; that the salaries and wages of the officials and wage earners aggregate more than two and one-half million dollars yearly; and that the value of its yearly products is almost $30,000,000. Surely this is an industry in which we may all be interested and upon which the blighting influences of this bill should not be laid, since the effect of the legislation proposed would be to crush it out of existence. And why will it not do so?

If we examine the same report—Table 4, page 3—we will find that the total quantity of cane sugar produced in Louisiana and Texas in 1909 was 334,100 tons, and that the total cost of production was $25,039,000—equivalent to $74.944 per ton, or $3.747 per 100 pounds. Now, at this cost of production, how could the southern producer afford to produce his product in competition with foreign sugars that can be delivered in New York, if duty free, for $2.443 per 100 pounds, that being the average cost of raw sugar during the past 11 years? Surely he could not do so and pay for material and labor what he is now paying. So, if this bill should become a law, he would have to do one of two things: He would have to pay much less for labor employed and for materials used, or he would have to discontinue his business. Do our friends on the other side of the House want him to grind down the wage of the laborer in the factory and on the plantation to meet this difference? Or do they want him to stop the manufacturing of his product, so that we may have the privilege of investing the $25,039,000, which he pays out yearly for labor and materials, in the products of foreign countries? Is this "a consummation devoutly to be wished," my southern friends? Remember that there will be just that amount of money less in your "Sunny South Land", at the end of each year, if he does.

Would it not be a cruel shame for you to compel him to do so? Think of it, my friends; and—if I may be allowed to use Biblical language—you may yet "repent of the evil which you were about to do unto your people." [Applause.]

OUR BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

The position which the Republican party has always taken in connection with the beet-sugar industry is easily ascertained. Up to the year 1891—the year in which the McKinley law went into effect—there had been manufactured in this country, in the aggregate, less than 17,000 tons of beet sugar. The law referred to placed raw sugar up to No. 16 Dutch standard, in color, on the free list, and provided for a duty of only one-half a cent per pound above that. Under this law the industry was fostered by way of bounty—the producer being given 2 cents for each pound of sugar produced—and under it the industry flourished: the aggregate for the years 1891 and 1892 being more than the production of all previous years combined, and the product of each of the years 1893 and 1894 being much greater than such aggregate.

So well was this industry intrenched in 1894, when the Wilson law was enacted, that it continued to grow and prosper until in 1897, when the quantity produced more than doubled that of 1894—the sugar produced in the later year being 40,398 long tons. The following year the quantity produced dropped back to 32,471 long tons; but since then the increase has been rapid—dropping back slightly in each of the years 1907 and 1908 because of weather conditions—until in the year 1911 we produced 506,825 long tons, and now have in prospect for the present year an estimated production of something like 540,000 long tons.

Since the year 1897 the tariff duties on sugar coming into the United States have been changed materially:

First. The product of Porto Rico—increased from 38,663 long tons in that year to 280,622 long tons in 1911—comes in duty free.

Second. The product of the Philippines—increased from 32,394 long tons in that year to 168,408 long tons in 1911—comes in duty free.

Third. Under our reciprocity treaty with Cuba, in 1903, her product comes in at 80 per cent of the regular duty. In 1910 we obtained from her, under this treaty, 1,640,182 long tons; but in 1911—because of shortness of crop, there—we obtained but 1,409,259. Had there been no short crop last year it is plain, under the facts already stated, that we would not have had to pay full duty on any sugar imported in that year; for such shortness of crop—230,923 long tons—was much more in amount than the full-duty-paying sugar—199,062 long tons—that we had to buy.

Fourth. Under the Payne law, passed in 1909, the duty on refined sugar was reduced 5 cents on each 100 pounds.

That these changes in rates, actually taking place, and other changes constantly being threatened have kept the sugar question in the air, and have greatly retarded the growth of the beet-sugar industry, no one having a knowledge of the subject will gainsay and few will even question.

Situate in my own home town, in the heart of the Michigan beet-producing territory, are the walls of a partially constructed sugar factory: abandoned in 1903, when we granted the preferential rates to Cuba under our treaty with her. Few, indeed, are claiming that the duties now existing are not high enough; but let it once be known that the regulations are to be left as they are for a reasonable term of years and the sugar-beet industry will go ahead by leaps and bounds; and the production of sugar will so increase that we will in our time, and this before long, see the United States in connection with her insular possessions producing all of the sugar necessary to supply our full demands; and those who follow us will be blessing the foresight that will be keeping them from dependence upon other countries for their supply of that commodity which they will have to have even though it shall take their hundreds of millions yearly to obtain it.

But we are told by some that our increase of supply is not keeping pace with our increase of demand; that while our yearly supply of beet sugar has increased only 466,427 long tons since 1897, our yearly demand has increased 1,100,300 long tons; but how illogical and misleading is this when we consider that while the demand has increased only about 49 per cent the beet-sugar supply has increased about 1,155 per cent; the increase in the one case being only arithmetical while in the other it has been geometrical increase. Given energy and material and geometrical increase is the law of growth. Given American energy and enterprise, with a practically limitless field, then geometrical increase will be the law of sugar production. Therefore the end of the next 15-year period—1927—would show 6,237,000 tons produced, while the consumption, increasing at the established rate of 49 per cent, would show 4,993,592 tons; so that production would not only have overtaken consumption, but we would have about one and one-fourth million tons for export, and this resulting from the growth of the beet-sugar industry alone. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, situated as we are respecting this industry, what is the course which we should pursue? It is a matter settled—as well as such a matter can be settled—that the cost of producing beet sugar in this country is now about $3.50 per hundred pounds. This is disclosed by the proofs taken in the Hardwick committee investigations, pages 2379 and 2380; and it is as well established that the average cost of raw sugar at the port of New York during the past 11 years has been, as before stated, $2.443 per hundred pounds—same hearings, page 3350. Add to this the cost of refining—not more than 50 cents per hundred pounds—and we have the actual cost of refined cane sugar, in the hands of the refiner, as being $2.943 per hundred pounds. Now, with the actual cost of beet sugar to the producer, $3.50 per hundred pounds, and with the actual cost of refined sugar in the hands of the refiner not more than $2.95 per hundred pounds—which would actually be the condition should this bill become a law—what would the beet-sugar producer have to do?

The answer is inevitable, and must be the same as that given in the discussion of the cane-sugar question; his labor and his materials—the latter being largely the labor of the beet producer—would have to be much reduced or he would have to engage in some other business that could be conducted at a profit.

No need to repeat this question to Republicans, for the real Republican always wants to stand by his party's teachings and carry out his party's promises. Republicans voiced what were their sentiments upon this question when in 1890 they provided for the bounty given to the sugar producer by the McKinley law; and in their national platform of 1896 they denounced in no uncertain terms the action of the Cleveland administration because of its not keeping faith with the sugar producer. The language of that platform is well worth repeating, well worth remembering:

> We condemn the present administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican Party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

What would be the declaration in a party platform at this day, if made by the great men who made that one, when—after taking in free the products of Porto Rico and the Philippines—the expense to our people for foreign sugar is still nearly $90,000,000 annually?

Are we going to continue to pay out this immense amount of money each year, or are we going to stand firmly upon the ground we occupy and let it be known that we are to stand by the producer of sugar in our land until our industry becomes so developed that we can supply our own demands? But one question should be raised in opposition to this, and that question is, Can we do it? And to this question but one answer will be given by the man who understands the sugar question, and that answer is, Of course we can. [Applause.]

And why not? In his annual report, published in Willett & Gray's Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal on January 12, 1912, F. O. Licht, the great German statistician, states that acreage in beets in that country during the past three years has not averaged more than 1,107,000 acres—equivalent in area to but two of our ordinary counties in the Middle West—and this is not more than one-two hundred and fiftieth of the land adapted to beet raising in this country, the official statement of the Secretary of Agriculture—to be found in Senate Document No. 22, Sixty-first Congress, first session, page 27—showing that we have at least 274,000,000 acres of land in this country, all of which is adapted to beet culture. And in a recent annual report he also states that—

> If we only consider those localities in this country that have the best facilities for taking up the beet-sugar industry and limit the territory to that portion capable of producing our own consumption of sugar, it might be said that the United States possesses some material advantage over Europe.

With these facts before us, and knowing that with this small—in comparison—acreage Germany produces over 2,000,000 long tons of sugar each year—nearly two-thirds of our consumption—why should we hesitate to embark upon the project of producing entirely our own sugar? Surely, with matters as they are, nothing stands in our way except our indetermination. [Applause.]

To be sure we can not now produce either the quantity or the quality of beets upon our lands that the Germans can produce upon theirs; but neither could they produce, in either respect, when they first commenced what they can now produce. The fact of the case is that the longer the land is used for beet-producing purposes—being properly rotated with other crops—the better it becomes for the particular purpose, and the better it becomes for all other purposes; the cultivation that has to be given it for this one purpose adding to its worth for all purposes. In our beet-producing territory in Michigan we find that the lands used for this purpose become greatly improved, and that the yield of other crops afterwards gathered from them are greatly in excess of the yield of the same crops from other lands in all respects as good.

Eventually, if we can rely upon the best information that we have, our land will be as productive, both as to quantity and quality, as are the German lands; and when that period shall be reached all the handicap the American producer will have will be the difference between the price paid labor here and the price paid labor there, and this every American should stand for. It is this difference between the price paid labor here and paid it elsewhere that makes our country what it is; and no American with the right kind of blood in his veins will want to lessen that difference, except it be through the uplift of those competing with us—which we should always have in mind and aid—and not by the lowering of our own conditions to meet the level of theirs. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me ask who are the parties principally interested in the lowering of duties on sugar in this country, and who are the parties who will be benefited? Trace almost any effort in this direction and it will lead you to the refineries—the giant sugar institutions that want to get sugar in their hands as completely as oil is in the hands of the Standard Oil Co., as coffee is in the hands of the Coffee Trust, and as steel is in the hands of the Steel Trust. They see, as those like them always can see, that when competition shall be crushed out matters will be wholly in their own hands, and they will be in a position to say "Up," and the price will go up, there to remain as suits their own sweet will. The consumer will have to pay the price; the $52,000,000 now collected by the Government will be lost to it, and will find its way eventually into the pockets of the refiners. They know this, and what they ask of Congress is the removal of the duties on sugar so that the beet-sugar industry may be destroyed—thus leaving them in the field alone. They want to have matters in their hands always, as they had them last year for a time—and until the producers of beet sugar came into the market with their products: the testimony of Mr. Wallace P. Willett, of the firm of Willett & Gray, before referred to, a sugar expert engaged by the Hardwick Committee, on page 3581 of hearings, being as follows:

There is no question whatever, Mr. Chairman, that the coming onto the market in October of the Michigan sugars and other domestic sugars dropped the price from $6.57 in October down to $6.11 in November and December $5.63.

And see, further, his testimony on pages 3153-3154 of same hearings:

If it were not for the domestic sugar industry, sugar in this country would be to-day very considerably higher. * * * I would not be surprised if it would not be a cent a pound more but for the beet and cane sugar produced in this country.

And, again, page 3978 of hearings:

In all these analyses I reach the same conclusion—that to decrease the price of sugar to the consumer, increase the domestic production as rapidly as possible.

It seems useless, Mr. Chairman, to cite testimony as to this matter. We already know these truths without testimony; but if anything had been necessary to show us the attitude of the refiners, and what we might expect should we get absolutely into their hands, the object lesson of last year should have opened our eyes, and we should have become cognizant of the fact that we are "skating on thin ice"; and if we desire to keep the price of sugar where it is, and if we desire to build up our own sugar industry—and thus keep ourselves out of the hands of the few refiners who want the duty on sugar removed, so that this industry may be destroyed—then we must see to it that the wishes of these men are not complied with. No one who wants competition destroyed is either directly or indirectly looking out for the interest of the consumer. The desire to destroy competition is always interested, and always points to self. This we should keep in mind and ever heed.

Mr. Chairman, I am against the provisions of this bill, and I shall be against the provisions of any other bill in which the duties on sugar, either raw or refined, shall not equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. We should build up our home industry, so that when we buy we will buy of ourselves, and thus at the end of the transaction have both the sugar purchased and what we shall have paid for it. This was the sentiment expressed by Lincoln in his memorable discussion of the tariff, and is as true to-day as when he uttered it. [Applause.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I want to offer an amendment to page 2, line 10. May I do so now at this stage of the proceedings, or must I wait until that paragraph is read?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph will have to be read first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Louisiana want to offer an amendment to the sugar paragraph?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that all debate on the pending amendment be closed with that on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NORRIS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, strike out the words "free of duty" and insert the words "at the prevailing rate of duty, omitting the differential and abrogating the Cuban preferential."

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, if my Democratic colleagues on this side of the House really intended to reduce the price of sugar to the consumers of this country, this is the proposition that they should have presented for the consideration of the House.

There is nothing in the Democratic platform calling for the destruction of any industry in this country. There is, however, a provision in the Democratic platform calling for the placing on the free list of articles manufactured by a trust, and those familiar with the sugar question in this country know full well that the producers of sugar, those engaged in cultivating beets in the West and those engaged in cultivating sugar cane in Louisiana and our island possessions, are not engaged in any trust. They know full well that the sugar manufacturers of this country who import their raw sugar from tropical countries alone are responsible for the conditions that exist in this country with respect to the price of sugar.

I would like to have been allowed an hour in which to discuss this proposition, but the management on this side of the House have seen fit to deprive me of an opportunity to be heard on this question. I am permitted in my own right to use but five minutes. I want to say to the gentlemen on this side that if they were not engaged in a game of buncombe on the American people they would reject the proposition in the bill now pending before the House and adopt this provision which I have offered, which would put the Sugar Trust out of business and permit the people of this country to enjoy the benefits of cheaper sugar. [Applause.]

But they are not willing to do that. The very evidence on which they predicate this bill, the very statement of the expert employed by the committee that has been investigating the Sugar Trust, negatives the proposition put forth by the leader of the majority and by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. Those gentlemen concede that Mr. Willett is the best expert in this country on sugar, and I confirm that statement. In my judgment, he is the best expert upon the price of sugar not only in this country but in the world.

He lays down this proposition, that the best way in which to reduce the price of sugar to the consumer is to increase the domestic production of sugar as quickly as possible. He made that statement on as many as six different occasions during those hearings, and yet gentlemen come into this House and submit this proposition, that in order to decrease the price of sugar to the consumer in this country you must destroy, they say, the domestic production. They have taken a position just opposite from that of the expert who they claim knows more about this subject of sugar than anyone else in this country.

Now, the chairman of the committee on yesterday in his address dealt extensively with the world's price of sugar; dealt at some length on the effect of this legislation upon the beet-sugar industry of the West; but he passed by almost unnoticed the question of the production of sugar from cane in Louisiana and our island possessions, and when one of my colleagues [Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana] asked if the effect of this bill would not be to destroy the sugar industry of Louisiana, he frankly admitted that he was not informed on that question. He comes here with a proposition by which it is proposed to destroy $150,000,000 of values in the State of Louisiana—with a proposition in which it is intended to take investments and property and throw them into the scrap pile. He comes here with this proposition and frankly admits that the committee itself has not even given consideration to so important a matter as to be able to inform the House whether he proposes to destroy all of this property or not. He comes before this House, and I undertook to ask him a question in regard to the fact of whether or not when sugar was free under the McKinley bill the price to the consumer was not even higher during the four years of its operation while that law was in force than it is to-day, even though bearing a duty equivalent to nearly 64 per cent ad valorem, but I could not get an answer to that question, except that he denied it and said that he would furnish the figures. I went out and obtained the figures and came back, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was speaking. I asked the privilege of interrupting him and of propounding the same question, holding these figures in my hand, but the gentleman had no time to yield to me. What is the reason for all this haste about legislation that will destroy so much of American wealth, so much of American labor, and which will cast upon a Louisiana community so much disaster as is contemplated in this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I stated in the beginning that I disliked to object to the request of gentlemen for unanimous consent to proceed, but in order that everybody may get in under the five-minute rule I shall have to insist upon a strict observance of the rule, which requires that only five minutes be allotted to each speaker.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Why, I was allowed an hour on yesterday, and the gentleman's motion took it away from me. The gentleman ought to be fair enough to permit me, when he proposes to destroy the prosperity of the State that I represent on this floor, to at least speak for five minutes, in order that I may present the facts to this Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish in my own time, in response to the statement of the gentleman——

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Is the gentleman speaking in his own time, recognized now?

The CHAIRMAN. He is.

Mr. BROUSSARD. By the Chair or by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, being in charge of a bill reported here by one of the committees of the House, it was not my duty to parcel out the time to those in the House who are opposed to the bill. I did desire that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] should have an opportunity to debate the bill. I endeavored to arrange that he might have that opportunity.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. No one else has objected to my having that opportunity but the gentleman from Alabama. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have heard no other objector.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Alabama can not lay aside his duties to this House and to the legislation of which he is in charge to accommodate any one gentleman on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman to wait until I finish my statement.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Right upon this point I should like to ask the gentleman if he did not abandon his duty as leader of this House, in charge of this measure, when he says he did not control the time in the matter of the discussion of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, certainly not. The time of this House was controlled, under the rules of the House, by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I made an offer to abrogate the rule, as is customary here, and asked unanimous consent——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I did not object to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). For 11 hours of general debate, to be equally controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and by myself. If I had controlled the time, I would have given the gentleman the time that he desired, but when objection was made and the bill was interfered with, it became my duty, then, to see that the House had an opportunity to vote on the bill in a reasonable time. There was no desire on my part to prevent the gentleman from Louisiana having an opportunity to debate, and the gentleman from Louisiana——

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not want me to speak, and I make the point of order that the gentleman limit his remarks to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has challenged my position upon the floor, has reflected on what I was attempting to do for him, and it was the exigencies of the case that arose——

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). That prevented my doing so.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment that I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will proceed in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the gentleman did not speak to his amendment either, but I shall obey the rules of the House and submit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada and Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will recognize me for a part of the time.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. I yield.

Mr. MANN. And that the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Nevada for the remaining portion of the five minutes. What I shall say will not be in order, and if any gentleman desires to call me to order I shall stop. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has repeated on several occasions that he offered to have 11 hours of general debate upon this bill, but the gentleman from Alabama is mistaken in his recollection. He never made such an offer.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order that the gentleman from Illinois is not discussing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MANN. If gentlemen are afraid to debate the bill and afraid to have the method of debate discussed, I am satisfied to sit down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order.

Mr. MANN. They are afraid of both things. Fraidy-cat! [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, the loud protest that comes from the State of Louisiana through its Representatives at this time reminds me of the fact that I have in my office three machines, all Underwoods. Two of them are typewriters and the other is a duplicator. All perform their functions in a thoroughly satisfactory manner, and the dispatch with which the work is turned out is a wonder; but when it comes down to the question of easy political expediency, they are as naught compared with the great machine in this House, commonly known as the Underwood political machine. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] It has presented to this House a bill affecting thousands upon thousands of our people and their interests, and it intends putting through the measure in the space of a few short hours, a measure which will strike a death blow to one of the greatest agricultural interests of this country.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Nevada is not discussing the amendment under consideration.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. I am discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. I am coming to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is that he come to it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Yes, it is a wonderful machine; an Underwood machine, and it turns out much pernicious and promiscuous legislation, and I might add, if permitted to continue, will succeed in turning out of employment thousands of workingmen in this country and in destroying——

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada (continuing). In destroying our greatest industries.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman is discussing the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. He is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman from Georgia knows what the amendment is.

Mr. HOWARD. I think I do, and I think I have about as much power of conception as has the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman ought to display it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from Nevada will proceed in order.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I can not sit idly by without protesting against the destruction of an infant industry in the State I represent, at Fallon, in Churchill County, the center of the great Truckee irrigation project, where hundreds of thousands of dollars are being expended in the beet-sugar industry, which gives promise of becoming one of the most stable industries in the State. The Government has expended millions of dollars in that reclamation project, and now that those settlers who have taken up land in that section, struggling under the most adverse conditions and regulations, have extensively engaged in the culture of sugar beets, which are adapted to that soil, it is proposed to strike down their industry without time for an open and free consideration of the questions involved. If ever an infant industry needed protection it is the beet-sugar industry in this country, and I emphatically protest against the passage of this measure, which is so framed as to leave out entirely the element of protection. Many measures of like importance have heretofore been rushed through this House in the same manner, and I verily believe that the Underwood Ways and Means Committee might properly be termed the "Underwood Free-Trade Duplicator." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would hesitate to impose upon the indulgence of the House at this time were it not for the fact that I am notoriously a timid man and am apprehensive as to the fate of my scalp should I return to my constituency without having given voice to my protest against this measure and venturing to suggest what seem to me good and substantial reasons for my opposition.

It is indeed deplorable that this great economic question should be exposed to the miasmatic and contaminating influences of petty politics, yet it is not to be wondered at when we stop to consider its many angles and the inducements offered the politician to reach the unsophisticated through an appeal to their cupidity. The mere words "free sugar" cunningly whispered into the ear are sufficient to deaden the trumpet sound that breaks its fulfillment to the heart. Of a truth can it be said—

> And be these juggling fiends no more believed,
> That palter us in a double sense;
> That keep the word of promise to our ear
> And break it to our hope.

No measure has been introduced into this body since I became a member of it that has offered a higher bid for demagoguery, and at the same time an incentive for exalted patriotism and nonpartisanship. It is an industry which, tracing it back to its earliest infancy, has never as yet reached the age when it could stand alone without the fostering care of legislation. There has never been an hour in the history of any civilized country when in its struggles for honorable existence it has been without that crutch. Human laws have apparently been more prodigal of help than scientific. The latter factor has but recently appeared upon the scene, and yet with these combined agencies, the world's increasing population and our consequent increasing consumption, the industry is subjected to other and newer enemies. Land is becoming scarcer. It must fight its way through the phalanx of such seared and lusty veterans as cotton, tobacco, corn, wheat, and legions of others for a footing, and the result in the final contest will be the survival of the fittest.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF SUGAR.

A short review of the history of sugar may not be inappropriate at this juncture, and may, perchance, prove instructive by way of pointing a moral as well as adorning a tale.

Up to the sixth century the saccharine substance was obtained principally through the industry of the busy bee. The first sugar obtained otherwise than as the product of this innocent benefactor of mankind was from the bamboo, but for many centuries its use was principally medicinal, and the ancient simile, "Like an apothecary without sugar," thus had its origin. In passing I may observe that this ancient saw has no peculiar application to the "shop" of the Committee on Ways and Means, for there seems to be no appreciable lack of medicine issued to us people of the West, and, similarly, on this occasion, to our friends from Louisiana. It has been administered to us persistently in allopathic doses from day to day and from night to night.

If there is any virtue in the old axiom, "Misery loves company," I should have consolation in the fact that my distinguished friend from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and his colleagues are made just now to take their medicine along with us. There is a difference, however, in our lachrymose condition. My wells are dry from exhaustion, whilst his are full to overflowing, the pump having just started. But his will soon dry and we shall, I regret to say, shortly find him on the other side of the table, enjoying my discomfort in the company of the majority.

THE FIRST TRUST.

There seems to be as much confusion of tongues concerning this schedule as there was upon the plain of Shinar, when the last brick was placed on the tower of Babel. Some place the blame for the high price of sugar upon the trust; others attribute it to the tariff, and some seem to recognize the trust as of modern origin as applied to this industry. But as far back as 1420 was born the first sugar trust. A certain Venetian evolved a new method of refining sugar and received 100,000 crowns ($120,000) for his invention from the Venetian Government. Her fleet was then the mistress of the seas. She controlled the world price of sugar for more than 60 years.

She ran the price up in 1482 on the London market to $275 a hundred, and by the close of the fifteenth century the price of sugar on the London market had decreased to only $53 per hundred. Then, by accident, the West Indies were discovered, and through a cooperation of the English and Spanish the production of sugar was so stimulated by heavy import taxes and liberal bounties that the price gradually fell, and it was not until the year 1515 that cane sugar was first introduced into Haiti. Spain and Portugal in the sixteenth century dominated the industry in Europe, and it was not until 1585 that London became an important refining center of sugar for the European trade, and it is a singular fact that she did not capture the trade until she went into the slave traffic and populated the British West Indies with captured negroes from Africa. In 1662 a company known as The Royal Adventures Co. Trading to Africa, was chartered and entered into a contract with the English Government to deliver 3,000 negroes annually to the British West Indies. It is also a notable fact that her supremacy waned when she declared against the slave trade, in 1828, and she completely lost it when the slaves were emancipated in the British colonies, in 1833. Then the business gravitated to the Spanish, Portuguese, and French, who still maintained slavery, and at that time more than one-half of the world's sugar was produced by slave labor in Cuba, Porto Rico, Brazil, the French colonies, Dutch Guiana, and Louisiana. In fact, the first negroes ever sent to this country were from Santo Domingo, in the year 1751, accompanied by sugar cane sent by the Jesuit Fathers of Santo Domingo to the Jesuits of Louisiana. As sugar had been the cause of the most intense commercial wars in Europe since the tenth century, and as it only prospered where negro slavery was introduced, and found its lodgment in Louisiana for the sole purpose of the cultivation of the cane, it is not too great a flight of imagination to say that the war of 1861 is traceable to the introduction of cane sugar upon this continent. It should be borne in mind also that coincident with the discontinuance of the slave trade and the emancipation of the negroes by the English the beet-sugar industry began its greatest strides.

THE SECOND AND PRESENT TRUST.

I have referred to the first Sugar Trust recorded by history. I now invite your attention to the next trust which history gives any account of, and which was born upon our own shores.

The first sugar refinery in the United States was established in 1689 on Liberty Street in New York, but the business did not assume importance until the middle of the succeeding century. At the close of the seventeenth century Philadelphia was the largest refining center, and Boston was holding second place. It was not until about the year 1805 or 1806 when this country received two German immigrants named Frederick and William Havemeyer, and the name, as you know, is now the synonym of "Sugar Trust." They started a small refinery in the village of Greenwich, which is now a part of the city of New York. They were well qualified, having had valuable experience in the method of refining sugar in Germany. They controlled but a small capital with which to inaugurate their enterprise, but it was not long before they had dominated the refining business of this country and they and their descendants have controlled it ever since, and the latter are now the dominating influence behind the Sugar Trust.

I am tempted here to digress for a moment to refer to a colloquy which occurred between our distinguished leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and myself upon the floor—which evoked considerable applause, in answer to my inquiry to the effect that, "Since when had the Democratic Party omitted to foster infant industries by a protective tariff?" He answered in effect, it never had; it was wholly a Republican policy. I am reminded that sugar producers and sugar refiners have been protected by duties upon imports of sugar since the formation of the Government, and we Democrats take special pride in the fact that up to the Civil War the Democratic Party was in power, and that therefore these must have been Democratic measures.

I have no doubt, however, he would answer that it was for revenue purposes only, and yet the facts are that under the administration of Mr. Madison in 1812 these two Havemeyers and the Louisiana planters were the beneficiaries of the raise of duty from 9 to 18 cents per pound on refined sugar, when the duty upon raw sugar was only 3 cents a pound, and this tariff was not for revenue, for it was absolutely prohibitory. It gave these American refiners a complete monopoly on refined sugar and the Louisiana planters a complete monopoly on raw sugar, and the duty was not placed below 10 cents per pound until 1842. There was, over this period, that long list of Presidents—Madison, Monroe, Adams, Jackson, Van Buren, and Harrison—some very sound Democrats, we must admit; and more than that, from 1816 to 1842, a refundment was allowed on all refined sugar exported in excess of the duty on raw sugar.

This historical résumé is pertinent, because I was undertaking to demonstrate by my inquiries of the committee chairman that the Democratic Party had not always turned its back upon the petition of infant industries, and that this legislation was enacted solely upon the theory of protection to what was then regarded as such an industry; and it must be borne in mind that over that period of time the consumer was paying the maximum price for his sugar.

ANOTHER TRUST.

This reminds me of another trust, namely, the one known as the Klaus Spreckels trust, on the Pacific coast. Spreckels obtained his raw sugar from Hawaii, and, by reason of his geographical position, he controlled the whole Pacific coast country. Apparently for his special benefit reciprocity relations were entered into with Hawaii in 1875, by which sugar was admitted free. Everyone can understand that theoretically this meant the lowering of the cost of sugar to the consumer; but the fact is—and it is within the common knowledge of all—that it had the very opposite effect. The price was raised to the consumer. The man who carried his sack of sugar upon his back from Spreckels's sugar factory in San Francisco across the street paid a higher price for it than did the man in Denver or in Kansas City.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to place sugar upon the free list. Its proponents contend that it will lower the price of sugar to the consumer in the amount of the duty, namely, 1½ cents per pound. Some, and possibly a majority, of those who are opposed to the measure maintain that would be but the temporary effect. I am convinced that the measure would have but few supporters if its present advocates could be brought to a realizing sense of the great probability of its being but temporary, and can any thinking man after a careful investigation doubt for one moment that the ultimate—and not very ultimate—effect will be to drive out of business the producers of both cane and beet sugar in the United States?

It is contended by the opposition that the refiners—the Sugar Trust—will be the direct and indirect beneficaries of the enactment of the measure, because in addition to the immense advantage they will have in the control of the entire imports they will have the indirect profit represented by a much smaller investment of capital by reason of not being subjected to a revenue tax.

The proponents, on the contrary, maintain that they will be deprived of this advantage because of the importation of refined sugar, and, of course, it is conceded, if that were possible, the consumer could be benefited.

I shall not undertake to discuss, as some have, the effect of this bill upon the industry in Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and our reciprocity agreement with Cuba, except to say, as regards the latter, that the farmers, especially of this country, are largely interested in exports to Cuba under the preferential agreement, the benefit of which will be denied them by the passage of the bill under consideration, and that the receipt of Cuban sugar free must necessarily displace some of that home product.

Our exports of farm and other products to Cuba since our treaty of 1903 have doubled. I will only mention a few items: In 1910 we sent there horses and mules amounting to $299,643; flour, $4,632,000; coal, $2,166,502; hennery products, $750,000; fertilizer, $559,000; meats and dairy products, $7,018,858; forest products, $2,704,684; potatoes, 1,041,152 bushels. The growth of this trade is shown by its steady climb. In 1909 the exports amounted to $48,217,689; in 1910, to $57,780,617; and in 1911, to $62,280,509. Our farmers' market there will be transferred to Canada, which now stands ready to take advantage of the abrogation of this treaty which this bill compasses.

I especially desire to call attention to the marvelously rapid and profitable growth and development of the beet-sugar industry in this country since its comparatively recent introduction as contradistinguished from the many centuries of energetic and diligent effort that have been devoted to the upbuilding of the cane-sugar industry.

Take my own State as an illustration. It has only been 11 years since the first beet-sugar factory was built, whereas there are now 17, and there are a number of others in course of construction. The acreage sown in beets has increased over one hundred and fifty fold. Its cultivation yields a revenue to our farmers and laborers of over $15,000,000 per annum. This enterprise affords employment to thousands of our citizens and its by-product furnishes fattening food for an immense number of cattle and sheep. It assures the farmer a greater profit from his labor than any other crop, and if, as is claimed, free sugar will destroy the industry, he will be compelled to turn his activities in another and possibly unknown and less profitable direction. Fidelity to our promised protection of infant industries, and as well our stewardship of the best interests of the American farmer, should prompt us to pause before we inflict such a possible calamity upon a great domestic enterprise.

The rule of the greatest good to the greatest number can not be successfully invoked in this instance, for not only has it no application, but we are confronted with a proposition directly the reverse. That there will be no refined sugar imported into this country is quite manifest from the fact that under the present duty, and because of the world's demand for refined sugar, there have thus far been no importations, and there is no reason to believe that refined sugar will come to us in preference to raw sugar, and that raw sugar will be imported in greater abundance goes without saying, and that it must pass through the hands of the trust is equally certain.

The domestic sugar producer can only expect to stay in business because of the trust's maintaining the present prices irrespective of the duty, which, without doubt, it is enabled to do. But it is very evident that for a time it will not do so, because its only competitor, the beet-sugar manufacturer, must be put out of business to complete its monopoly.

THE REAL BENEFICIARIES.

I am reminded in this connection of a very significant statement made by our distinguished leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, as follows:

> This bill, if it becomes a law, will admit free of duty sugar of every kind and description from all of the markets of the world. It is contended that if we pass this bill we will destroy an American industry. I do not believe that is true, so far as the American sugar-refining companies are concerned—that is, the cane-sugar refining companies.

We need go no further for authority to the effect that the beet growers' and the cane growers' industry will be destroyed, and that the refiners (the Sugar Trust) will be protected. And yet there is a discordance even with this declaration in another part of his speech, and in which he elicited great applause from the House, when he said that $60,000,000 was being taken by the refiners and the producers of sugar to maintain the sugar industry, which, added to the $52,000,000, amounted to over $115,000,000, as he said, which rested upon the bellies of the poor people of America; and the wonder to my mind, when he made that statement, was how the people were going to receive the benefit of that $60,000,000 that the refiners got, when the refiners at the same time were not going to be injured.

But be that as it may, my greatest wonder is that he should have indulged in any argument to show that the refiners, or the trust, were not to be injured. It was the very first intimation coming from any source that anybody entertained any misgivings in that direction. The investigating committee, known as the Hardwick committee, had all the captains of the Sugar Trust before it, and I quote at length from the testimony given by them as well as from some of the so-called independents and some manufacturers of the beet sugar.

Among all of the different interests represented at the hearings before the special committee, it might well be expected that there would be a great difference of opinion on many subjects. On two vital questions, however, there was a practical unanimity of opinion. The first was that removal of the tariff would be greatly to the advantage of the interest controlling the great refineries, and the second was that the removal of the tariff would result in the utter destruction of the domestic sugar industries of the United States, both cane and beet.

Both of these propositions would seem to be easily demonstrable, but since there has been an effort to becloud the issue upon this point, let the testimony settle the question.

REFINERS WANT FREE SUGAR.

CLAUS A. SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. In other words, perhaps, you would take it (the tariff) all off, would you not, and have free trade?

Mr. SPRECKELS. I would have free trade. (Pt. 27, p. 2277 of Hearings.)

Mr. HINDS. You would have free trade in sugar?

Mr. SPRECKELS. Absolutely. (Pt. 27, p. 2278 of Hearings.)

CHARLES R. HEIKE, SECRETARY AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO. FROM 1887 TO 1910.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar, could we produce either cane or beets in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then that would destroy the industry absolutely in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And you would approve of that?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes. (Pt. 4, p. 292 of Hearings.)

WILLIAM G. GILMORE, PARTNER, ARBUCKLE BROS., SUGAR REFINERS.

Mr. MADISON. In other words, you think the thing to do is to take off the duty, and that it would be to your advantage to take it off as a refiner of cane sugar?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADISON. And you would advocate the taking off of the duty?

Mr. GILMORE. I would, personally. I am only speaking now personally. (Pt. 14, p. 1169 of Hearings.)

JAMES H. POST, PRESIDENT NATIONAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. POST. If Congress did not need the revenue from sugar. That is a different proposition. But they have to have it from something, and sugar seems to be the thing that has paid a part of it for a great many years. As far as I personally am concerned, I would like to see free sugar. As we look at the country at large, however, I think it would be a very unfair proposition. (Pt. 6, p. 527 of Hearings.)

WILLIAM A. J. JAMISON, PARTNER, ARBUCKLE BROS.

Mr. RAKER. How would it affect you if there was no tax on the importation of sugar—raw sugar?

Mr. JAMISON. I think it would enable us to run more constantly.

Mr. RAKER. What do you mean by that, now?

Mr. JAMISON. To keep up the capacity.

Mr. RAKER. Will you explain it?

Mr. JAMISON. I mean we would be able to sell more sugar.

Mr. RAKER. Do you not have a supply all the time?

Mr. JAMISON. Well, we are not able to run full at all times.

Mr. RAKER. Because of the way raw sugar is shipped into the United States?

Mr. JAMISON. Oh, no; on account of the beet product. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar; if the duty was removed, I mean to say. * * *

Mr. RAKER. * * * What would you think would be a fair compensation [reduction]?

Mr. JAMISON. I think there should be a cent a pound taken off at the present time at least, and later——

Mr. RAKER. A little more?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes; until it is entirely removed. (Pt. 14, p. 1195–1196 of Hearings.)

EFFECT OF FREE SUGAR ON THE DOMESTIC INDUSTRY.

Edwin F. Atkins, vice president and acting president American Sugar Refining Co.:

(Hearings, p. 145.)

Mr. HINDS. You think that the taking the tariff off would cripple the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. ATKINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HINDS. That is, you mean drive them out as competitors?

Mr. ATKINS. It would cripple a great many of them.

Mr. HINDS. And what would it do to the Louisiana and Texas people?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not think they could produce in Louisiana without some protection.

(Hearings, p. 165.)

Mr. MADISON. Suppose we were to have absolute free trade in sugars in this country; suppose we just simply took down the bars and absolutely eliminated our tariff duties on sugar. You said a while ago that it would destroy the beet-sugar man, did you not?

Mr. ATKINS. Absolute free trade would destroy very many of the beet factories; not all of them.

Mr. MADISON. It would practically destroy them all, would it not?

Mr. ATKINS. It would injure the industry—absolute free trade.

Mr. MADISON. I just want to get the fact of the matter, whatever it may be. Would it injure it materially or only slightly?

Mr. ATKINS. Under absolute free trade there are very many beet factories in the country that could not operate at all. Some of them could. Some of the factories that are protected by 1,000 and 1,500 miles of freight rates could get along, where they get their beets cheap and produce at a very law cost, as in California; they could survive, in my opinion. They say they could not. But absolute free trade would cripple many of the beet-sugar manufacturers. It would cripple the Louisiana people by bringing prices down to a point below their cost of production. That would not be the case with a little reduction in the tariff. They would go on and reduce their expenses where they could and continue producing. If you wipe out a large source of supplies temporarily, you are going to advance the price of that merchandise.

Mr. HINDS. If we should reduce in this country the tariff on sugar, if we should wipe it out, you say it would almost destroy the cane-sugar industry in this country and the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. ATKINS. Why, I think it would; because $1.34 a hundred is a great part of the price, you know.

CHARLES R. HEIKE, SECRETARY AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO. FROM 1887 TO 1910.

(Hearings, p. 208.)

Mr. FORDNEY. If the duty were removed on foreign imported sugar, would the benefits inure to the beet-sugar industry and not to the refiners that refine foreign imported raw sugar?

Mr. HEIKE. The refiners would have the advantage.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what I meant.

Mr. HEIKE. The beet-sugar companies probably would find great difficulty in making beet sugars at all.

(Hearings, p. 238.)

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Heike, I do not know that I made myself fully clear in one question this morning. I think we agreed on the same point, which is the reason I want to be clear. I think you stated to me a reduction of the duty on imported raw sugar would quite surely be disastrous to the domestic beet and cane industry and would inure to the benefit of the refineries?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes, sir; I think the disaster depends upon the extent.

Mr. FORDNEY. If we were to have free trade on sugar, the beet-sugar industries would be obliged to cease?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes; except the favored localities.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is, if the price of raw——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the answer, Mr. Heike?

Mr. HEIKE. I say yes; except the favored localities; for instance, California; I guess they could.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the price of raw sugar were to be reduced to the extent of the duty?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes; and if we had absolute free trade.

Mr. FORDNEY. The beet-sugar industry would have to go out of business?

Mr. HEIKE. At least the Michigan, I think, would. Perhaps not. For that reason, if there was a reduction, it should be very slowly made.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar, could we produce either cane or beets in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then that would destroy the industry absolutely in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And you would approve of that?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

HENRY T. OXNARD, BEET AND CANE SUGAR MANUFACTURER.

(Hearings, p. 440.)

Mr. RAKER. How much do you say the duty could be reduced?

Mr. OXNARD. Not a bit, not one farthing. If you reduce it, you are going to knock out the beet business. The beet business has not yet developed to that point where it is time to talk of reducing the duty on sugar if you are going to build it up. If you want to stop it, reduce the duty.

HORACE HAVEMEYER, FORMERLY DIRECTOR AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO., NOW SUING FOR CONTROL OF NATIONAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

(Hearings, p. 597.)

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Havemeyer, let me put it in this way: If the duty were removed on all imported raw sugars right now—it has been clearly brought out here by several witnesses that the domestic industry can not survive without protection—and if the duty were removed right now, there is no question in your mind that the beet and cane industry of this country would have to cease doing business?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. Yes; that is my belief—if it were removed.

CHARLES B. WARREN, PRESIDENT MICHIGAN BEET SUGAR CO.

(Hearings, p. 721.)

Mr. GARRETT. Free sugar would reduce the price?

Mr. WARREN. You gave the Cubans a concession, you know——

Mr. GARRETT. Free sugar would reduce the price?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly, for awhile, until they drove us out of business, and then the Germans would take care of the price of dry granulated in Germany, and the Russians in Russia, and the French in France, and they would put the price on raw sugar up, and you would pay the price, and they would get it easier. That is what would happen to the United States.

THOMAS R. CUTLER, PRESIDENT UTAH-IDAHO BEET SUGAR CO.

(Hearing, p. 810.)

Mr. CUTLER. I think they ought to be inquired into further. You are asking a question, and I will elaborate on it a little bit. The refiners are clamoring, of course, no doubt, for a reduction of the tariff. Who would be benefited by a reduction of the tariff? Why, the refiners, as against the beet-sugar factories. The refiners, if they can buy their sugar for two-thirds of what they are paying to-day will, of course, be benefited.

Mr. MALBY. Raw sugars, you mean?

Mr. CUTLER. Yes; raw sugars. They will continue in business and they will sell more sugars. Sugar will become cheaper. They will sell more sugar because sugar is cheaper. They will have less money invested in their business. There is a greater opportunity to make profits when sugars are low than when they are high. It is all in favor of the refiners. There is a great howl for free trade on sugars, but they will kill the beet-sugar industry sure.

(Hearings, p. 851.)

The CHAIRMAN. You said this morning, during the progress of the examination, that the beet-sugar people could not get along without the present tariff. Am I quoting you correctly on that?

Mr. CUTLER. I feel that way—that they could not and pay dividends.

The CHAIRMAN. And pay dividends; and you also said charge off the proper amount for depreciation of the plant?

Mr. CUTLER. I said I could not. I did not apply it to anyone else. I let everybody else make their own statements.

CHESTER S. MOREY, PRESIDENT GREAT WESTERN (BEET) SUGAR CO.

(Hearings, p. 894.)

Mr. MALBY. Something has been said with respect to the effect upon the beet industry in case of the repeal of the present tariff. Is that found to be advantageous?

Mr. MOREY. We could not live without the present tariff. I do not believe there would be a beet factory in the United States if the tariff were removed. That is my honest opinion.

JOHN D. SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT WESTERN SUGAR REFINING CO. AND SPRECKELS SUGAR CO.

(Hearings, p. 957.)

Mr. SPRECKELS. Take the tariff off of the sugar, and it means the death of the beet-sugar industry in this country. They employ lots of labor in the factories. Of course, they will have to seek other employment if those factories are closed.

(Hearings, p. 991.)

Mr. SPRECKELS. My statement is that if the duty was taken off that would mean the annihilation of the beet-sugar interests in this country.

Mr. MADISON. Yes.

Mr. SPRECKELS. I mean the utter destruction of it.

(Hearings, p. 1018.)

Mr. HINDS. So it is not absolutely certain that by doing as this circular advises—taking off the protection from the beet-sugar companies and turning it to the refineries, the trust, and the other refineries—you would get cheaper sugar?

Mr. SPRECKELS. No; not at all; because you are going to drive out the beet business, and, of course, there will be that amount of deficiency; and the question is, Can that deficiency be made up elsewhere? And if it can not be made up, of course there will be a shortage, and then the law of supply and demand is going to rule.

CHARLES W. NIBLEY, DIRECTOR, UTAH-IDAHO SUGAR CO.

(Hearings, p. 1107.)

Mr. SULZER. I say, so you believe that there is no legislation that Congress can enact in regard to the product of sugar and the price of sugar to the people that would cheapen the cost of sugar to the consumer thereof?

Mr. NIBLEY. Oh, yes; I think they could. If they took the tariff off of sugar entirely I think it would probably—probably cheapen the price a little temporarily, but it would be at the ruin of the great beet-sugar industry—the utter ruin.

Mr. SULZER. You are pretty sure of that, in your judgment.

Mr. NIBLEY. I am.

(Hearings, pp. 1107–1108.)

Mr. RAKER. There is one other question I would like to ask Mr. Nibley. He has been very positive in one answer, and I would like to have him take his time and get it in the record as he understands it. You say, if the tariff was taken off of sugar, the importation of sugar, raw and refined—I understand both—or either, that it would ruin the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. NIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Will you explain, Mr. Nibley, why it would?

Mr. NIBLEY. Because sugar would be temporarily, for a year or two or three, cheaper, so much cheaper that it would ruin that industry, and my opinion is—of course, that can only be a matter of opinion with you or I or anybody—my opinion is that in a little while the price would come back to about where it was before, and that it might be fixed up in some way so that it would be even more.

Mr. RAKER. But you did not get the purport of my question, and when I get that I am through. You say it would ruin the beet industry?

Mr. NIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Which means the cultivation of the beets, the beet manufactories, and those engaged in either of them?

Mr. NIBLEY. That is what it means.

Mr. RAKER. It would ruin their business?

Mr. NIBLEY. Certainly it would.

Mr. RAKER. They could not stand a reduction of half a cent?

Mr. NIBLEY. No, no. I think some of the factories now are not making half a dollar a bag, on an average, where they have to ship it to the river.

WILLIAM F. GILMORE, PARTNER IN ARBUCKLE BROS.

(Hearings, p. 1168.)

Mr. MADISON. Suppose we just went to work and took the duty off, then what would occur?

Mr. GILMORE. There would be cheaper sugar.

Mr. MADISON. What would be the effect as to your people—beneficial or otherwise?

Mr. GILMORE. It would be beneficial in so much that we would have only about half the money invested in the job.

Mr. MADISON. It would be beneficial inasmuch as it would destroy the beet-sugar people?

Mr. GILMORE. It would keep them at home.

Mr. MADISON. Keep them in a limited locality?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes.

Mr. MADISON. And leave the field to you people that is naturally yours, as you feel?

Mr. GILMORE. Our natural field; yes.

WILLIAM A. JAMISON, PARTNER IN ARBUCKLE BROS.

(Hearings, p. 1195.)

Mr. JAMISON. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar. If the duty was removed, I mean to say.

F. C. LOWRY, SALES AGENT, FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

(Hearings, p. 1612.)

Mr. FORDNEY. You do not care a snap about the domestic industry, do you, in reference to this statement, if your statement just now is true?

Mr. LOWRY. You say I do not care a snap about the domestic industry?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. You do not care whether it succeeds or not. You are not interested in the welfare of the beet and cane sugar industry of this country.

Mr. LOWRY. Not particularly; no.

Mr. FORDNEY. You, then, would be willing to have sugar put upon the free list, even though it crushed out this domestic industry?

Mr. LOWRY. No, sir. I do not think it would be quite fair to put sugar on the free list. I think it would be very desirable from the consumer's standpoint, but I am frank to say that I do not think it would be quite fair at this time.

(Hearings, p. 1735.)

Mr. FORDNEY. If taking off the duty would destroy the industry, you would destroy it, would you?

Mr. LOWRY. How is that?

Mr. FORDNEY. If by putting imported raw sugars on the free list the domestic beet and cane industries in this country would perish, you would destroy them, would you?

Mr. LOWRY. I testified yesterday that I did not think it would be fair to the domestic industry to put sugar on the free list.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it really on account of the competition, Mr. Atkins?

Mr. ATKINS. I think so. * * * There is very much larger capacity than is required, and the beet sugars are taking away the trade of the refiners year by year. (Atkins, 48.)

Mr. MADISON. So you can hardly ascribe it to the fierce competition by the beet-sugar people?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly. All that beet sugar comes on the market at a certain season of the year. It is all produced in about three months' time. They all want to market it just as rapidly as possible, and in order to do that they come to the eastern points. California sugar comes into Chicago and the Michigan sugar into Buffalo and Pittsburgh, and eastern refineries—not only the American Sugar Refining Co., but the others—have to reduce or close down until the beet sugars are out of the way. Any refining that is done between the 1st of October and the 1st of January is done without any profit and very often at a loss.

Mr. MADISON. Then, as a matter of fact, your competition with the beet-sugar people only exists during a few months of the year?

Mr. ATKINS. Three months, and that is 25 per cent of the whole time. (Atkins, 49.)

Mr. MADISON. You stated a moment ago, Mr. Atkins, or this morning, that you decidedly opposed going into the beet-sugar business. What was the reason of that? * * *

Mr. ATKINS. The beet-sugar business was a competitive business. It produced in the western territories, where our market lay. That is, I say our market, I mean the market of the refiners, the various refiners. As that industry grew, and I foresaw that it would grow rapidly, I believed that it would reduce the volume of business, not only of the American Sugar Refining Co. but of all the refiners on the Atlantic coast, and although we had millions of dollars invested in the business there we were building up a competitive business, one that would compete with ourselves and one which was bound to get away from us—we could not control it in the end. I say we. I had no connection whatever with it; that was simply a business man's opinion. (Atkins, 85–86.)

Mr. GARRETT. Do you know whether last year, at the time that beet-sugar manufactories began operations, any of the refining plants belonging to the American Sugar refining Co. received instructions to, or did, without instructions, withdraw from the territory usually covered by the beet-sugar trade?

Mr. ATKINS. No; not through any instructions. They were forced to withdraw from the territory, owing to the cutting of prices. We could not pay duty on imported sugars and get them so far west as would enable us to sell in competition with these beet sugars. (Atkins, 94.)

Mr. RAKER. How far west do you ship?

Mr. ATKINS. We ship, when we are able to do so, out to Omaha and Kansas City.

Mr. RAKER. You ship no farther than those points?

Mr. ATKINS. We would if we could, but we can not get in there owing to the competition of the beet factories. * * * (Atkins, 99.)

Mr. HINDS. You think that the taking the tariff off would cripple the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. ATKINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HINDS. That is, you mean drive them out as competitors?

Mr. ATKINS. It would cripple a great many of them.

Mr. HINDS. And what would it do to the Louisiana and Texas people?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not think they could produce in Louisiana without some protection.

Mr. HINDS. If those people were eliminated, of whom would the American people buy their sugar?

Mr. ATKINS. They would buy sugars abroad. They could get a little more from Cuba; probably Germany.

Mr. HINDS. You think the Sugar Trust would still be in business selling to them?

Mr. ATKINS. Buying from them?

Mr. HINDS. No; selling to the American people.

Mr. ATKINS. In all probability. (Atkins, 145.)

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Heike, you spoke about the duty on sugar being an advantage to the refineries?

Mr. HEIKE. Of the beet-sugar companies, did I not?

Mr. FORDNEY. As against the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. HEIKE. No; in favor of the beet-sugar industry, the duty is.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the duty were removed on foreign imported sugar, would the benefits inure to the beet-sugar industry and not the refiners that refine foreign imported raw sugar?

Mr. HEIKE. The refiners would have the advantage.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what I meant.

Mr. HEIKE. The beet-sugar companies probably would find great difficulty in making beet sugars at all. (Heike, 208.)

Mr. MADISON. It would be beneficial (removing the duty from raw sugar), inasmuch as it would destroy the beet-sugar people?

Mr. GILMORE. It would keep them at home.

Mr. MADISON. Keep them in a limited locality?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes.

Mr. MADISON. And leave the field to you people that is naturally yours, as you feel?

Mr. GILMORE. Our natural field. Yes.

Mr. MADISON. In other words, you feel that all east of the Mississippi River, where they can not very well produce sugar beets, is the natural field of the cane-sugar refiners, while the plains and mountain States, where conditions are favorable to the production of beet sugar, is the natural field for the beet-sugar people?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes; I think so. (Gilmore, 1168.)

Mr. RAKER. Michigan sugar, you say, competes with yours in New York?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes; the Michigan sugar has been down to New York State and all through there. It has interfered with us very largely in sales in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Mr. RAKER. And West Virginia?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. How would it affect you if there was no tax on the importation of sugar—raw sugar?

Mr. JAMISON. I think it would enable us to run more constantly.

Mr. RAKER. What do you mean by that, now?

Mr. JAMISON. To keep up the capacity.

Mr. RAKER. Will you explain it?

Mr. JAMISON. I mean we would be able to sell more sugar.

Mr. RAKER. Do you not have a supply all the time?

Mr. JAMISON. Well, we are not able to run full at all times.
Mr. RAKER. Because of the way raw sugar is shipped into the United States?
Mr. JAMISON. Oh, no; on account of the beet product. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar. If the duty was removed, I mean to say. (Jamison, 1195.)
Mr. SULZER. I understood you to say that you believed the tariff on raw sugar should be materially reduced.
Mr. JAMISON. Yes.
Mr. SULZER. Just to what extent, in your judgment, should it be reduced?
Mr. JAMISON. I should think it should certainly be reduced 1 cent a pound.
Mr. SULZER. One cent a pound?
Mr. JAMISON. Yes.
Mr. SULZER. If it were reduced by legislation 1 cent a pound what, in your opinion, would be the result?
Mr. JAMISON. Well, I think it would confine the sale of beets very largely into their own territory instead of permitting them to absorb freight rates and sell their product about 10 or 20 points under the eastern granulated coming into this territory. It costs them anywhere from half a cent to three-quarters of a cent per pound freight to get it here. (Jamison, 1201.)
Mr. HINDS. Can you tell me how far in the East the beet-sugar people are able to market their sugar?
Mr. SPRECKELS. There is the dividing line on the Missouri River. They sometimes come as far as Pittsburgh. I think the American Beet Sugar Co. has come once as far as New York City.
Mr. HINDS. Have they not come into New England, Mr. Spreckels?
Mr. SPRECKELS. They have come into the State of New York.
Mr. HINDS. Have they not also come into New England some?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I think so.
Mr. HINDS. One member of the firm of Arbuckles testified that they had come into New England.
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes, sir.
Mr. HINDS. Are they showing a tendency to come farther east all the time?
Mr. SPRECKELS. They are.
Mr. HINDS. And they make the competition severer, if it is competition?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes.
Mr. HINDS. Continually?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes, sir. They have frequently come as far as Pittsburgh. (C. A. Spreckels, 2267.)
Mr. HINDS. Mr. Spreckels, you have been carrying on a campaign to reduce the tariff as beneficial to the cane-sugar refiners?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I have.
Mr. HINDS. Of course, that will be damaging to the beet-sugar refiners?
Mr. SPRECKELS. To some extent it will. (C. A. Spreckels, 2275.)
Mr. HINDS. In other words, perhaps, you would take it (the tariff) off, would you not, and have free trade?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I would have free trade.
Mr. HINDS. You would have free trade in sugar?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Absolutely. (C. A. Spreckels, 2277, 2278.)

It not only appears from that testimony that the Sugar Trust is not to be hurt by the passage of this bill, but it appears that unless it is passed the beet-sugar industry will seriously interfere with the trust monopoly; and it has been their effort, and it is their present desire, to get rid of this rival, and everyone knows what it means to get rid of a rival. It certainly bodes no good to the consumer of the product of the survivor.

STATUS OF THE CONSUMER.

But let us inquire what are the naked facts regarding the status of the ultimate consumer. It is estimated we will produce from beets this year 540,000 tons of sugar. This is 15 per cent of our total consumption. Does it strike the ordinary mathematical mind that if you subtract 15 per cent from the total of our consumption it will make sugar cheaper? On the contrary, does it not impress the mind exactly the contrary?

That is not all. The market for this sugar only lasts about three months of the year. During those three months it constitutes 36 per cent of our consumption, and as the market is circumscribed to a territory not farther east than Buffalo or Pittsburgh, and not farther than south of the Ohio River, say St. Louis, during those months it supplies 70 per cent of their consumption. Our Secretary of Agriculture states that at least 274,000,000 acres in the United States are suitable for the production of sugar beets. Had beets been raised thereon last year, and the crop been an average of last year's yield, and had it been converted into sugar, the supply, at the present rate of consumption, would meet the demands for 2,000 years. There is less than one-half of a million of this acreage now in cultivation, and yet we produce 15 per cent of our entire consumption.

So it is demonstrable that in order to get cheaper sugar it is necessary to raise more sugar from our limitless resources. I quote Mr. Willetts, the most eminent authority upon that subject, from the testimony taken before the Hardwick committee. But, first, let Mr. HARDWICK, the gentleman in charge of this bill and the chairman of the Hardwick committee, introduce Mr. Willetts, his chosen expert. He says Mr. Willetts is the "greatest sugar statistician in America and among the very greatest in the world":

Mr. SULZER. What, in your judgment as an expert, would bring about a permanent reduction of the cost of manufactured sugar to the consumers of the United States?
Mr. WILLETT. By increasing the amount of domestic production and in Porto Rico and Hawaii—that is, by increasing the quantity of sugar within the United States to the extent that we would be required to purchase no sugar whatever at world prices. Last year we bought only 77,000 tons at the world price. We were as near as that to that condition in 1910. We did come within 77,000 tons of being entirely free and independent of the world's prices, whereas a few years before we had been importing 6,700,000 tons. (Misprint; should be 670,000.)
Mr. SULZER. In other words, you think it advisable for the Government of the United States to do everything within its legitimate scope to encourage the growth of cane and beet sugar in the United States?
Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.
Mr. SULZER. And in our insular possessions?
Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir; in our insular possessions.

(Willett, p. 3589.)

Mr. HINDS. Then, Mr. Willett, the world's price for sugar is not a supply-and-demand price entirely, is it?
Mr. WILLETT. What reference has that to Russia?
Mr. HINDS. With all these arrangements of bounty and these other arrangements, it results that the supply and demand of sugars——
Mr. WILLETT (interposing). You mean it is not free to seek a proper level?
Mr. HINDS. Yes.
Mr. WILLETT. No; it is not free throughout the world to seek a proper level of price.
Mr. HINDS. And the world's price is an artificial price?
Mr. WILLETT. To the extent that the trade of the world is not free and open and clear and it is subject to bounties and restrictions and conditions. What we want to do is to get independent of all that, and we can do it.
Mr. HINDS. Suppose we increase considerably in the Philippines and Cuba increases considerably and the beet-sugar supply in this country doubles, will not that make a revolution in sugar?
Mr. WILLETT. Most decidedly. That is what I say—increase the Cuban, Porto Rican, Hawaiian, Philippine, and domestic cane and beet sugar industry to a point above our requirements for consumption up to 500,000 tons, so that if Cuba should give out some year and not produce much sugar we would still have enough for our consumption. Then we would be independent of the world, and we would make our own (world's) price.
Mr. HINDS. And what ought that price to be in the United States?
Mr. WILLETT. That price, after equalizing the production to consumption, will depend upon the competition between the different interests—between Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the domestic beet and cane industry. They will all be working to get our market, and the consumer then will get the advantage.
Mr. HINDS. And probably we would get the cheapest sugar on earth?
Mr. WILLETT. We would get the cheapest sugar on earth under those conditions. There is no doubt about that.
Mr. HINDS. And is that situation really in sight, do you think?
Mr. WILLETT. We came within 74,000 tons of it in 1910, and this year, according to the outlook of the Cuban crop at the present moment, we will come—I should say that we might meet it, provided that the shortage in Europe does not infringe upon our Cuban reserve. Already the United Kingdom has bought 140,000 tons away from our supply in Cuba, but they are reselling it, or trying to.

Mr. WILLETT. * * * This promotion of our industry is a much more vital point—from the consumers' standpoint included—than is a reduction of tariff to a point that lets in foreign sugar and thereby diminishes the home protection. Whenever we reach the condition indicated, competition between our free and partially free duty producers will begin and the consumers will benefit thereby and the United States will be entirely free from the speculative and other influences which control the world's price, and it is not unreasonable to expect that, under the conditions indicated, the United States will become a considerable exporter of its surplus production to the foreign countries which may be short of supplies, as under present conditions abroad.

As showing the ultimate effect of home production equal to or surpassing home consumption, I call attention specially for earnest consideration to the fact that in 1910 we reached this desired consummation within 74,000 tons, and as a result we were almost independent of Europe; so much so, in fact, that we got our supplies from Cuba at over one-half cent per pound under world's prices, during which time one man (Santa Maria) was carrying on a big bull speculation in Europe, in which we would certainly have been involved but for this limited amount we required that year. In 1911 the Cuban crop fell short of 1910 by 320,898 tons, and we required 212,182 tons from abroad to complete our supplies; hence we were involved in the world's prices in 1911, and the result was a hue and cry against the high prices of sugar. I am not making an argument, but am simply pointing to the facts that appear to me to make the consideration of the increase in our local supplies of greater importance in legislation than a reduction of duties beyond certain limits, those limits to be such as will positively exclude all sugars outside those of our States and dependencies.

Mr. MALBY. When we assemble ourselves and say "If it were not for the tariff we would get sugar 1½ cents per pound less," I sincerely doubt it, because of the fact that if our expectations were realized, and it was reduced 1½ cents per pound, I venture the suggestion there would be no sugar produced in the United States; and if no sugar were produced in the United States, which production now amounts to 850,000 tons, the price of sugar would not be reduced 1½ cents, but by reason of that quantity being taken from the world's supply the chances are more than equal the price to the consumer under those conditions would be the full amount of the duty now paid. Now, those are matters which I want to submit to you, and ask you whether or not they are entitled to very careful consideration at all times when we are dealing with this subject.
Mr. WILLETT. I think, Judge MALBY, you are absolutely correct in every statement you have made, in the event of the entire duty being taken off of sugar.

In all these analyses I reach the same conclusion—that to decrease the price of sugar to the consumer, increase the domestic production as rapidly as possible.

No one denies that the temporary effect will be to lower the wholesale price of sugar, but the testimony is of too meager a character to predict that the taking off of the duty will cause a reduction to the consumer even temporarily. But everyone will agree that we will put it in the power of the refiner, or the Sugar Trust, to control the price, and he may or may not lower the price, depending upon how his interest may be best subserved. The testimony shows that he unquestionably will first put all of the sugar men out of the business by lowering the price, after which he will manipulate the price in his own individual interests.

It must be known that these captains of industry—the heads of these refineries—who have been so persistently knocking at the penitentiary doors for years in their criminal practices at the ports of entry, will not be overscrupulous in further impositions upon the public by any means within their power.

WHAT IS THIS OLD COUNTRY FIT FOR?

But it is said by my friend Mr. HARDWICK, the chairman of the Hardwick committee, and who must be congratulated upon his brutal frankness in predicting the downfall of the domestic sugar industry, that all the sugar this country will need for consumption can be raised in the Philippines cheaper than here, and I could not but remember while he was speaking that from time to time during this and the last session there have been declarations made upon this floor to the effect that wheat was at too high a price and that Canadian wheat should be allowed to come in free because it could be raised cheaper there; meats were too high, and the meats of Argentina should be allowed to come in free; wool was too high; our markets should be thrown open to the New Zealander and the hatless, shoeless, and breechclouted bushmen of Australia for the same reason; that lead and zinc could be mined cheaper somewhere else; and now it has been found that sugar could be grown somewhere else cheaper and it should be brought in to supplant another home industry, and I seriously wondered to what advantageous uses this old worthless country of ours could be turned to after we had surrendered to these far-off people our markets for all their products.

As I look about me now and observe so many of the seats of members of the Ways and Means Committee vacant, I am wondering whether they are in that "apothecary shop" compounding more medicine for us western people, or whether they are not to be found upon some near-by promontory with powerful telescopes diligently investigating the deltas of Mars in a frantic effort to discover what may be grown by the Martians at a less price than we can grow it here, anticipating a draft upon that country for cheaper soil productions.

CONCRETE FACTS.

But, seriously speaking, Mr. Chairman, it has been estimated that only 30 pounds of sugar per capita are used in this country, coming across the grocer's counter. This, at the price of 1½ cents, the amount of the duty, would be 45 cents per head, assuming that each person got the full benefit of the duty; and that, as I have said, if at all, could only be for a brief period, when the pendulum would swing the other way. The other 50 pounds of sugar goes into manufactured products, prominently among which—and I have only time to mention a few—are condensed milk, biscuits, crackers, confectionery, chewing gum, tobacco, and the like. On a 15-cent can of condensed milk at the present price of sugar, if the duty were taken off and the manufacturer got the full benefit of it, he would make two-fifths of a cent on his 15-cent can. Does anybody believe that any part of that two-fifths of a cent would pass to the consumer? And yet condensed-milk companies used last year 140,000,000 pounds, and the Government, by the loss of its duty, would lose $1,866,000. In biscuits and crackers there are 127,750,000 pounds of sugar used per annum. In all the fluctuations in the price of sugar the price of biscuits and condensed milk have not been influenced in the least. The price of a package of Uneeda biscuits will remain as it has remained, at 5 cents, but the Government would lose $1,700,000 per annum revenue. So with reference to candy; the price has never fluctuated by reason of the change in price of sugar. The yearly consumption of sugar by the manufacturers of candy is 612,500,000 pounds. The Government would lose in revenue $8,166,700 per annum without the least benefit to the consumer.

Take chewing gum, for instance. Last year there were 25,000,000 pounds of sugar used in the making of this article, the duty upon which would be $350,000 per annum, which the Government would lose, and no one can truthfully claim that the chewer of the gum would be benefited.

So we have those four branches of manufacture into which sugar largely enters, viz, condensed milk, biscuits, confectionery, and chewing gum, representing a duty of $12,000,000 per annum—an absolute loss to the Treasury of the United States with no benefit to the consumer whatever; but this amount must be paid by the consumer through some form of taxation.

The tobacco manufacturers use sugar by cargo loads, and yet it would be as difficult to find even an infinitesimal saving to the chewer of tobacco as it would be to find a corresponding advantage to the chewer of gum, yet it is very easy to trace the needless loss to the Treasury.

EFFORTS TO PREJUDICE THE PUBLIC.

It has been stated that the beet-sugar manufacturers are realizing too great a profit. Our distinguished leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, informs us that they are making 9 per cent on their investment. Why, Mr. Chairman, how utterly insignificant is that profit when compared with the enormous profits of the Sugar Trust, the beneficiaries of this measure, and of the Steel Trust, whose profits from one single railroad last year amounted to over 240 per cent. I am really surprised that the percentage of profit to the beet-sugar manufacturers is so small. I had thought it was larger. It should not be regarded as excessive in any quarter, but should be a potential argument in its favor. They are the pioneers of an infant industry, in new and untried fields, and are entitled to a profit commensurate with their natural risks.

Mr. HARDWICK, with an adroitness worthy of a better cause, endeavors to prejudice the beet raiser against the millman, intimating the latter does not pay him a proportionate part of the profits. Then he especially appeals to the prejudices of other farmers by showing how much more the beet grower makes than they. He then appeals to the prejudices of the consumers of sugar against—and it is I who put the words in his mouth, for he is too polite and courteous to say so—the "deadbeat" beet growers.

I wish to admonish these toilers of the soil thus appealed to that this is one of the many tocsin notes reverberating in the political campaign. You will soon be awakened by an alarm drawing your attention to your own specialty, whether it be in the domain of grain or stock growing. You will be asked to farm your lands and breed your stock on shares with alien people. And you, dear susceptible people who only consume, will be asked to look to the foreign producer for merciful prices. Not since the days of the fathers of the Republic has there been a greater incentive for our husbandmen to stand together to avoid falling separately. Stand idle, any one of the group of producers, and see another fall and you open wide the gates making for your own downfall.

But there is a consideration which recommends itself that Brother HARDWICK overlooks. The farmer is not always treated fairly in his dealings with the purchasers of his products, but as respects the sugar-beet farmer the manufacturer is completely at his mercy, and it is the only instance wherein the farmer holds the balance of power. Consequently when you strike at this particular industry you strike directly at the farmer. My position with respect to this product of his labor is the same as it is with respect to all of his products—I am unalterably opposed to any invasion of his rights, either from within or from without.

We who appreciate and sympathize with his hardships and trials, under so many unfavoring conditions, will refuse to bow to the action of any caucus which is, in our judgment, inimical to his interests, nor be bewitched by any party expedient to betray him. He bears the heat and burden of the day. From the rising of the sun to the going down thereof his is ceaseless toil. He is subjected to all the vicissitudes of the elements, and even when he sows the reaping may not be his. The devastating cannonade of hail, the unseasonable frosts, the relentless rain, or the dreadful siroccos often intervene and bring disappointment to his worthy ambition to provide food, clothing, and education for his dear ones. The visitations of sickness and death do not accommodate themselves to his condition, circumstances, or convenience, and the grim shadow of the tax collector periodically slants athwart the threshold of his humble home.

Mr. Chairman, as long as my voice shall be heard in these halls it will ever be raised in sincere and earnest appeal for the alleviation of the burdens of the farmer, and for the promotion of his well-being, which should be the first consideration of every American legislator, for he is the bulwark of our national greatness.

Again, it has been charged that the Sugar Trust is a large owner in the beet-sugar factories. While it is true that it does own some of their stock, it is nevertheless true that it does not, directly or indirectly, control one single factory or field. The trust first sought to dominate the industry for the purpose of destroying it. This is abundantly shown by the testimony I have quoted, and it is undisputed that they are getting rid of their stock as fast as possible in anticipation of legislation making it worthless.

The enactment of this measure at this time will violate the plainest principles of economic laws. The further you investigate it the plainer it is shown that the consumers of sugar in this country, who now have it at a cheaper price than any other people outside of England, will soon be compelled to pay more than any other people. I know of no greater solecism than to maintain that to decrease the product will increase the supply; to subtract from means to add to; to divide means to multiply; the less the supply the greater the demand; the greater the demand the less the price; the greater the supply the higher the price. Eliminate competition to lower prices, corner the market and give the consumer a chance, but by all means do not favor novices in the distribution of favors. Give the monopoly to those whose long experience in exploiting the people will afford the least danger of miscarriage.

WHEN WILL BOMBARDMENT CEASE?

Are we of the West never to enjoy the surcease of Federal enfilading of our industries? Our silver mining was long since shot to death. Nearly one-third of our public domain has been apparently forever withdrawn from occupation and the taxing power. The prospector has been booted from the trail. The homeseeker has been driven to Canada. Our watersheds have been denuded of their forests, thus destroying our natural reservoirs, which rapidly makes way for a modern Sahara. Our valuable coal deposits and water-power sites are covered into the Federal Treasury. Our flockmasters are driven from the ranges. And now we are threatened with having our cereal, meat, wool, metal, and sugar markets turned bodily over to our foreign competitors. The wrongs we have suffered and those with which we are threatened are chargeable to both political parties. Yesterday one took a slice off, to-day the other a slice, and it is only the demagogue who will claim that one of the parties is less censurable than the other. It all comes from the insatiable greed for more commercial power to our eastern neighbors, assisted by an inexperienced and unwise coterie of politicians who would adopt a policy which makes for the country's woe in order to bring about a political advantage, even though of doubtful character.

Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief from the manufacturers of sugar beets. Nine out of the seventeen factories in our State are located in my district. Their owners did not support me in 1908 nor 1910. With the possible exception of one of the counties wherein they are located, there came the largest majorities against my election to this body, although my position was as well known then as it is now. Therefore in giving voice to my position in this matter I am not paying a political debt, nor am I actuated by any hope of future political reward. My footsteps are following the pathway which, I believe, leads to just and proper dealing with both the consumer and the American farmer. I believe in adequately protecting the product of the "tillers of the soil." The industries of these worthy citizens should be sanctuaried against every human foe. If this bill becomes a law, the Government will be departing from a settled and time-honored policy, coincident with the birth of the Nation, and flying in the face of the approved policy of the world. It will be breaking faith with those who, on the strength of tradition and existing law, have invested over $2,000,000 of capital, throw out of employment over 300,000 laborers, disturb in general the equilibrium of supply, and, in addition, this confiscatory proceeding will destroy the only safeguard of the people against the practices of a band of commercial plunderers as powerful, unrestrained, and merciless as were the buccaneers when their black-flag frigates were mistresses of the high seas.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, from whence comes the doctrine on which this destructive bill is based? What national policy demands this wanton and disastrous blow to the sugar industry of this country? Can it be possible that this legislation points out the new course which the Democratic Party is to follow? Or is this a piece of unadulterated political buncombe to ensnare the unthinking by the attractive but fallacious plea that you will lighten the burdens of the poor and transfer them to the rich? When the Democratic hosts accepted the royal hospitality of Colorado's proud capital and in its last convention, assembled in 1908, announced its tariff policy little did the enthusiastic representatives of that and other thriving Commonwealths anticipate this violent attempt to throttle their industry. No such construction was ever given to that platform in the campaign discussion, but on the contrary we were solemnly assured by Democratic advocates and orators that the Democratic Party, if intrusted with power, would not injure any legitimate industry. These strong assurances sound strangely incongruous and ridiculous in the presence of recent performances. Where, then, can we find the authority for the present tariff program? Can we find it in the doctrine laid down in the historic but obsolete Confederate constitution, which denounced the right of government to lay duties which would encourage or foster any domestic industry? I read from section 7, article 1, the constitution of the Confederate States:

> Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, impost, and excises for the revenue necessary to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and carry on the Government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the treasury; nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

Is the Democratic Party wedded to this doctrine? Is its future tariff policy to be in harmony with the principle therein declared? Evidently the present Democratic majority is deeply inbued with the free-trade idea. Whenever you get beneath the surface of the "tariff-for-revenue-only" reformer you at once uncover a genuine and hereditary free trader. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in bringing in these bills has been perfectly frank in announcing his ultimate purpose, but the bills so far presented by his committee have only shown a veiled form of free trade. In this bill, however, the mask is thrown aside and a bold and audacious attempt is made to institute free trade in this country. But why should an industry of such promise and importance as the sugar industry be the first victim of this ruinous policy? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in his speech yesterday, tells us that, with the exception of brief interruptions, it has been the unbroken policy of our Government from the beginning to raise a considerable revenue from a tariff on sugar. In his report on this bill, which strikes the death blow to the industry, he states:

> The growth of the beet-sugar industry in this country during the decade ended with 1909 is shown, in Table 1, to have increased 117 per cent in number of establishments, 399 per cent in the quantity of beets used in the manufacture of sugar, and the value of the products has increased almost sevenfold.

Does this furnish a justification for the reversal of this century-old, settled tariff policy now at a time when the rapid growth and development of our sugar production seems assured? Why this hostility to this important and rapidly growing industry?

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], who has given great research to the production of cane sugar in the Tropics and beet sugar where produced, to my inquiry very frankly and candidly admitted that the beet-sugar production of the world can not withstand the competition of the cane sugar of the Tropics, declaring that beet-sugar production was a hothouse industry wherever it is found.

We are not building for an hour or for a day. It is our patriotic duty to lay a sound and safe foundation upon which to erect the structure of our national security, prosperity, and greatness. Sugar is one of the necessaries of life. We expend vast sums of money in obtaining a supply for our people. Under existing conditions our country and its possessions supply one-half our needs. The remainder of our supply, excepting an insignificant quantity, is derived from Cuba, over which we exercise a sort of benign guardianship. Thus one-half of our present supply—our own production and that of our possessions—is duty free, while Cuban sugar, in pursuance of treaty stipulations, pays only 80 per cent of a full duty. The present bill also strikes a severe blow at the prosperity of our island possessions, whose well-being we are under moral and just obligations to promote. Again, we are called upon to instantly sever our relations with Cuba in violation of our solemn treaty stipulations, and thereby seriously unsettle conditions in that unhappy country, for whose welfare we should and must ever entertain a feeling of friendly and intimate concern. Speaking of beet sugar in the United States, we find that our country is admirably adapted for the production of beet sugar. We need only utilize 1 acre in every 250 acres in our country adapted for sugar beets, added to our cane production, to fully supply our entire market. The beet crop is a new and distinct source of wealth to the farmer. The raising of beets demands intelligent methods of soil cultivation and results in improving the fertility of the soil. It naturally encourages the division of land into small holdings and insures the most intensive cultivation. In the neighborhood of beet-sugar factories you will find the most handsome and well-ordered farm homes and a high state of soil tillage. Under the system of irrigation in the West beet culture has proven highly successful. The farsighted and benevolent policy which the Government has undertaken of reclaiming the waste places by a series of irrigation projects will open to settlement vast areas especially adapted to beet-sugar production. The sugar beet requires much sunshine to yield the best results, and in the West, as a friend expresses it, "We have 365 days of sunshine, and the balance of the year is bright and fair." My State is vitally interested in this industry. I saw it start, I have watched its growth, and I realize how much it means to the agricultural development of our country, for, after all is said, the production of beet sugar is an agricultural industry.

The sugar factory bears the same relation to the growers of beets as does the flour mill to the grower of wheat. This industry has made rapid strides in the face of adverse conditions. But while we are so splendidly fitted for sugar production, when we seek the markets of the East we are confronted with a distance and freight charges that operate as a handicap to marketing our surplus production. Any fair estimate to determine our fate under free-trade conditions must take this factor into the calculation. Now, I am not going to load my speech with columns of figures. The life of statistics is comparatively short, as we live in a world of constant change. I intend only to make an appeal to the broad patriotism, plain common sense, and intelligence of those who believe it to be the legitimate province of government to exercise its powers so as to promote our national welfare in the broadest sense, to make our people prosperous and independent, especially for food and raiment, and the means of national defense. The beet-sugar industry in this country has abundantly fulfilled the most sanguine expectations of its advocates and has strikingly vindicated the wisdom of the protective policy. It is now firmly established in 16 States, with 71 factories in operation, and representing a capital of approximately $100,000,000. Unfortunately, in the past it has been the child of doubt and uncertainty. A cloud has hung upon it since we embarked upon the enterprise; it has been retarded by apprehensions over free cane sugar from our island possessions, by the Cuban preferential, and the uncertainty of our Government policy concerning it. It has survived the croakers and knockers, who, at its inception, declared we could not make sugar in this country. It has survived the unfriendly doubts of some men in high places in the house of its friends, but notwithstanding these drawbacks it has grown amazingly in recent years.

I have already cited the tribute to its growth contained in the majority report by Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will now refer to the report of Mr. FORDNEY in behalf of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means, which displays far more thorough and searching study of the question. I read from page 12 of that report:

> The real development of the beet-sugar industry in the United States dates from the passage of the Dingley Tariff Act, in 1897, at which time there were only 6 beet-sugar factories in this country, producing 37,500 long tons of sugar per year. In the fall of 1911 there were 71 sugar factories in active operation, which will produce this season approximately 525,000 long tons of sugar from 429,000 acres of beets. There is thus a gain of over 1,200 per cent since the passage of the Dingley law.

Now, in the face of this splendid growth and extension why, in the name of common sense, should we pursue a policy to utterly despoil it? No other nation in the world has ever undertaken such a shortsighted, suicidal policy. It is true the great refining interests, recognizing the rapid growth of beet-sugar production and its steady and rapid encroachment upon their business, are united in urging free sugar. This is clearly proven to be their position, as disclosed in the testimony taken before the sugar investigating committee. Every New York refiner who testified before that committee, and practically all of them did testify, came out in favor of free sugar, or such drastic cut in the present duty as would cripple the domestic industry. Mr. Atkins, vice president and acting president of the American Sugar Refining Co., tells us of quarreling with Mr. Havemeyer when the latter proposed to acquire interest in beet-sugar concerns, and in giving his reasons for objecting said:

> The beet-sugar business is a competitive business. It is produced in the western territories, where our market lay. That is, I say "our market." I mean the market of the refiners, the various refiners. As that industry grew, and I foresaw that it would grow rapidly, I believed that it would reduce the volume of business not only of the American Sugar Refining Co., but of all the refiners on the Atlantic coast, and although we had millions of dollars invested in the business there, we were building up a competitive business, one that would compete with ourselves, and one which was bound to get away from us; we could not control it in the end. I say "we"—I had no connection whatever with it; that was simply a business man's opinion. (Hardwick Hearings, pp. 85–86.)

Mr. Jamison, a partner of "friend of the people" Arbuckle, that great philanthropist who has done so much toward reducing the price of coffee, which is now on the free list, and who is apparently anxious to duplicate this performance in sugar for the benefit of the great consuming public, testified that—

> The Michigan sugar has been down to New York State and all through there. It has interfered with us very largely in sales in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

He goes on to say that he wants the duty taken off of sugar "on account of the beet product," and adds:

> If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar. If the duty was removed, I mean to say. (Hardwick Hearings, p. 1195.)

Every refiner who went on the stand—Claus A. Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co.; Charles R. Heike, former secretary of the American Sugar Refining Co.; William G. Gilmore, partner of Arbuckle Bros., sugar refiners; James H. Post, president of the Brooklyn Cooperage Co., a subsidiary of the American Sugar Refining Co.—all had the same tale of woe to tell concerning the hardships they were suffering on account of the beet-sugar competition, and all expressing the desire that this young rival should be wiped out by the removal of the duty on sugar. Beet sugar is the competitor they fear most will loosen their grip upon the markets of this country. This bill gives effect to the selfish propaganda they have been engaged in for free sugar. It is in their interests, and a death blow to that most beneficent agricultural auxiliary—beet-sugar production. You are sacrificing an industry that can be carried on by limited capital, and from the nature of it not capable of control by a trust, to swell the profits of the Sugar Trust and perpetuate the power of this lawless and grasping monopoly. The assurance that the same friendly and permanent policy toward beet sugar on the part of our Government that the countries of Europe have shown toward this industry would witness a mighty advance in the production of beet sugar in this country. New factories would spring up all over the land. These factories would be constructed of American material and machinery and erected by American workmen. Lands that now produce $10 or $20 per acre would contribute to our wealth at the rate of from $50 to $100 an acre, every dollar being the product of our own people and every dollar expended in exchange for other products of American labor.

What a fallacy and a cheat it is to attempt to make the producers in this country believe they are benefited by buying sugar from Java or some other tropical country, that buys little from us and in whose civilization and traditions we have no part, because of its cheapness, when thereby they limit and diminish the purchasing power of their best customers. After all, in the final analysis the people most entitled to the solicitude of the Government have only the products of their labor to exchange for the commodities they require produced by other labor. The sugar producer in this country simply exchanges his labor for the labor of his American craftsman in another line. The question of "cheap" or "dear" depends solely upon the fairness of this exchange of labor. The interest gatherer and coupon clipper and the creditor class may be benefited by cheapening the products of toil, but such a condition bears with cruel severity and crushing effect upon the debtor class. Now, what has been our uniform experience in dealing with foreign countries? The moment we are dependent for any staple article, controlled as sugar is by European syndicate, and all domestic competition is removed, up goes the price. The removal of the duty may bring about a temporary reduction in price, but, oh, at what a cost! When the industry is destroyed in this country our own trusts and foreign syndicates will lay such tribute upon us as their own sweet unconscionable will may determine. You surrender fifty-three millions of certain revenue and subject the Treasury to the risk and doubt of a method of recouping the loss of extremely doubtful validity and of wholly unknown revenue-yielding power. You boast of relieving the people of fifty-three millions of taxation annually. As a practical question you do not. You absolutely ignore the fact and refuse to say that a large part of the sugar consumed in this country is used in various lines of manufacture where the duty is imperceptible and does not enter into the computation in fixing the price of the manufactured article. It has been carefully estimated that at least 40 per cent of the sugar consumed is used in various manufactures. I will print at the close of my remarks this estimate, but will enumerate some of them here: Condensed milk, biscuit, pie and cake bakers, confectioners, chewing gum, corn products refining companies, liquors and wines, preserves, soda-water sirups, desiccated cocoanuts, Quaker Oats, jelly manufactures, such as gelatin, Jell-O, Deserta Co., candied fruits, rock candy and rock-candy sirups, drugs, medicines, chemicals, cocoa manufacturers, ice-cream manufacturers, infants' food, packing houses, distilled wines, champagne, fruit sirups, and mincemeat. How much will the consumer benefit from the reduction in these articles? Not one penny. You simply take from the Treasury $10,000,000 to place it in the private coffers of these manufacturers. This bold and desperate free-trade bill will serve one useful purpose, and that is to emphasize before the country the reckless, ruinous character of the legislation that the Democratic Party might enact if clothed with full national power. Thousands whose prosperity is menaced shudder at the prospect and are fervently grateful that the citadels of power are still manned by Republicans who will be true to their pledges and principles and repel these blighting onslaughts. While I have heard and deeply sympathized with the earnest appeals and protests against the ruin and destruction of various industries throughout the country involved in the tariff program thus far brought out, I want to say that the Mountain States are singled out upon which to inflict the most severe and crushing injury. Our industries seem to be especially singled out for sacrifice under the present régime. What lot or parcel can the people have with the Democratic Party? The mining industry, the stock-growing industry, the sugar industry, prime factors in our prosperity, all marked for slaughter by this free-trade policy. You may temporarily impede our growth and impair our prosperity, but "Westward the course of empire takes its way," and the Democratic Party can not retard it. This suicidal policy will not continue to prevail in this country. There is one consoling thought in all the anxiety and solicitude caused by these cruel assaults on our prosperity, and that is that the antics of the party now clothed with a little brief authority will serve to focus the attention of the country on the awful calamity that would follow complete Democratic supremacy. The attention of the people will be drawn from the political side shows and various political vagaries with which they have been flirting to the serious consideration of statesmanlike policies necessary to insure that prosperity and peace upon which our stability as a nation depends. The wreckers will be driven from place and power and the Republican Party with all its pristine vigor and statesmanship given supreme command. [Applause.]

SUGAR USED IN MANUFACTURES.

Even those who denounce the Payne-Aldrich tariff law as unjust, unfair, and oppressive and framed in the interests of the trusts and monopolies must agree that the sole purpose of a downward revision should be either to benefit the Government or the consumer, or both. Undoubtedly the lowering of duties on certain articles would result in great general benefit, while a reduction on other articles would simply deprive the Government of the income without benefiting the consumer.

From what I have heard and read it seems that as far as the general public is concerned the effect which a reduction of the duty on certain articles would have is thoroughly misunderstood.

This refers especially to sugar. People are made to believe that because the consumption of sugar is 80 pounds per capita per year the removal of the duty, say, 1½ cents per pound, would mean a saving of $1.07 for each individual per year, or about $5.35 per family per year. As far as I have been able to ascertain no special efforts are being made to draw attention to the absurdity of such a theory.

Only a comparatively small portion of the total quantity of sugar consumed is purchased by the consumer from his grocer "in the shape of sugar." The balance is used as ingredients for candy, condensed milk, crackers, biscuits, bakers' products, preserves, ice cream, and for hundreds of other purposes too numerous to mention. In order to realize to what an enormous extent sugar enters into the manufacture of mixtures and compounds it is only necessary to mention a few items.

CONDENSED MILK.

I understand that the Borden's Condensed Milk Co. and their Michigan branch use about 200,000 barrels of sugar per year, and that they manufacture about 50 per cent of all the condensed milk produced in this country. Thus 400,000 barrels of sugar, equal to about 140,000,000 pounds, are annually used for condensed milk alone.

The retail price of a 1-pound can is about 15 cents. This pound of condensed milk contains about 40 per cent of sugar. The wholesale price of granulated sugar is 4½ cents. Therefore the cost of all the sugar contained in 1 pound of condensed milk is only 1⅘ cents. Now, let us suppose that a reduction in duty would lower the price of sugar 1 cent per pound, making the price of granulated 3½ cents per pound. The cost of all the sugar contained in 1 pound of milk would then be 1⅖ cents. In other words, it would make a difference of two-fifths of a cent on a 15-cent can.

Statistics will show that the wholesale price of condensed milk is not influenced by the fluctuations in the price of sugar. It is therefore evident that it would not have any effect on the retail price.

What would be the result if the duty would be removed? The Government would lose, say, 1½ cents per pound in duty on 140,000,000 pounds, or $1,866,000; the consumer would gain nothing. It would merely benefit a few manufacturers of condensed milk.

BISCUITS AND CRACKERS.

It is of course impossible to ascertain the exact quantity of sugar used by all the biscuit manufacturers in this country, but, considering that the National Biscuit Co. alone uses over 120,000 barrels per year, it is more than probable that at least 1,000 barrels of sugar per day are required by the entire biscuit and cracker industry of this country. This would represent 350,000 pounds per day, or 127,750,000 pounds of sugar per year. It is a well-known fact that the price of biscuits is not influenced by the fluctuation in the price of sugar. For example, the price of a "package" of "Uneeda Biscuits" will remain 5 cents whether the comparatively small percentage of sugar it contains cost 4½ cents or 3½ cents per pound. What would, therefore, be the result if the duty on sugar should be removed? The Government would lose, say, 1½ cents per pound on 127,750,000 pounds, or over $1,700,000 per year; the consumer would gain nothing by it. It would only benefit the manufacturers.

CONFECTIONERY.

Most people are acquainted with the enormous advance in the candy industry, and few people realize the immense volume of this trade in the United States. The latter is really the greatest candy-making and candy-eating country in the world. In fact, the census returns reveal the astonishing fact that the United States produces more candy than England, France, and Germany combined.

The census for 1905 gives the number of establishments as 1,348, capital invested $43,125,408, and the value of the products $87,087,253.

By act of Congress of March, 1902, under which the census of 1905 was taken, it was provided that the enumeration should be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system. Therefore all of the small establishments included in the Twelfth Census—1900—were omitted.

In order to make the statistics of the census of 1900 and 1905 comparable, it was necessary to retabulate the reports of 1900. In that year there were 947 establishments in the trade classified under the new plan of tabulation as factories and 3,350 establishments doing a smaller business and not properly considered as factories. The report of 1905 discloses that in the five years following the previous census the number of factory plants increased about 42 per cent and the capital increased about 65 per cent. The increase in output was about 43 per cent.

The number of small shops which figure as factories in the 1900 census, which were eliminated from the census of 1900, produced annually goods to the value of over $20,000,000, this being an average of a little more than $6,000 for each establishment. As the number of small shops doubtless increased in the same ratio as the factories, it was figured that their output was equal to $29,525,633, which amount added to the value of the product accredited to manufacturing establishments gave a total of products of $116,612,886. This was five years ago. The census of 1910 is under way, and of course there are as yet no available figures. It is likely that they will show a value in goods of fully $150,000,000, not including the small factories.

It is therefore probable that the total value of candy made in factories in 1910 will exceed $200,000,000. This represents the cost of goods at the factory—the jobbing price. Now comes the cost of distributing the manufacturers', middlemen's, and retailers' profits.

As the standard of varieties is not fixed by any accepted or acknowledged test, the profits are naturally very great, and it is safe to say that the consumers of the United States pay at least $350,000,000 per year for confectionery made in factories. It is, of course, difficult to ascertain the exact quantity of candy this represents, as the price varies greatly—from 10 cents to $1 per pound.

If we take 20 cents per pound as the average retail price, the above would represent 1,750,000,000 pounds of confectionery per year. It would require an expert to give even an approximate estimate of the quantity of sugar required to produce this candy. Some varieties consist almost entirely of sugar, while others contain a smaller percentage. The use of glucose in candy making is, according to my informants, much less than generally supposed. Some of the better grades contain no glucose at all. According to one authority, for every 30 pounds of glucose 100 pounds of sugar is used. Let us suppose that the average candy contains only 35 per cent sugar. This would mean that 612,500,000 pounds of sugar are used per year by candy manufacturers. It goes without saying that whether sugar costs 4½ cents or 3½ cents per pound the retail price of an article like candy, selling as high as $1 per pound, will remain the same. To the manufacturer a difference of 1 cent per pound in the price of sugar would only make a difference of a small fraction of a cent per pound of candy. Example: Let us suppose that a certain grade of Huyler's candy contains even as high as 50 per cent of sugar and costs 80 cents per pound. One cent difference in the price of sugar would therefore "theoretically" change the price of this candy from 80 cents to 79½ cents per pound.

It will be found that the retail price of candy has never changed, owing to fluctuation in the price of sugar. In 1905 the price of granulated sugar was 5¼ cents; to-day it is 4½ cents; but the retail price of candy has not changed.

An article like candy, a luxury in the true sense of the word, which is even sold "by the piece" and "by the stick," can not be affected by a small change in the value of such a low-priced ingredient as sugar.

The above would show that the Government would lose the duty of, say, 1⅛ cents per pound on 612,500,000 pounds of sugar, or $8,166,700 per year, without benefiting the consumer. The manufacturers would be the only ones to benefit by it.

In connection with the above I wish to say that my estimates and figures only refer to "manufactured" candy, and do not include home-made candy made with sugar bought by the consumer from his retail grocer.

CHEWING GUM.

As far as I have been able to ascertain, there are approximately 6,500,000 pounds of chicle (the gum substance used for chewing gum) imported into this country annually. This substance forms about 20 per cent of the chewing gum which is put on the market. Consequently it is estimated that about 32,500,000 pounds of chewing gum are annually consumed in the United States. The analysis of the samples which I had analyzed (Chiclets, Spearmint, and Adams's) shows that this article contains about 75 per cent of cane sugar. This would mean that about 25,000,000 pounds of sugar are annually used in the manufacture of chewing gum. Although chewing gum contains 75 per cent of sugar, which costs only 4½ cents per pound, the retail prices of chewing gum are as follows:

Chiclets, 5 cents per package of 1½ ounces, or 53 cents per pound.
Spearmint, 5 cents per package of one-half ounce, or $1.60 per pound.
Adams's, 5 cents per package of one-half ounce, or $1.60 per pound.

If chewing-gum manufacturers would get their sugar at 1 cent per pound less they would save three-fourths of a cent per pound of chewing gum, the retail price of which is $1.60. It goes without saying that even if sugar cost them nothing, it would not affect the retail price of chewing gum.

I believe that the American Chiclet Co. (Chiclets, Adams's, and so forth) controls about 60 per cent of the total business; the William Wrigley, jr., & Co. (Spearmint) about 15 per cent, and the balance is divided among numerous smaller independents, a list of which I have on file.

The duty on the 25,000,000 pounds of sugar used in connection with this luxury—chewing gum—amounts to about $350,000 per year, which amount the Government would lose without benefiting anybody except the manufacturers.

According to the above estimates, the quantity of sugar required in only four branches of manufacture, viz, condensed milk, biscuits, confectionery, and chewing gum, is over 900,000,000 pounds, representing a duty of over $12,000,000 per year.

The principal object of this letter is to point out in a general way the absurdity of the claim that the amount of money which the Government would lose by reducing the duty on sugar would go into the pockets of the consumers.

I have confined myself to only a few products which, however, should suffice to draw attention to the enormous extent to which sugar enters into the manufacture of compounds and mixtures, the retail prices of which would not be affected by the downward revision of the tariff.

Sugar is used in connection with hundreds of other products. The manufacturers of ice cream, preserves, bakers' products (not including biscuits), pies, medicines, and so forth, must use enormous quantities of sugar. Even the tobacco manufacturers use sugar. The American Tobacco Co. buys its raw sugar by the cargo.

I believe that a careful study of a thorough investigation by acknowledged experts would reveal the fact that but a comparatively small percentage of the sugar used is purchased in the shape of sugar by the consumer from his grocer.

I wish to state that I do not claim my estimates to be accurate, and in order to be of any real value they should have to be revised and corrected by statistical experts who are thoroughly posted in the respective branches.

How much of the entire consumption of sugar is purchased by the consumer as sugar from his grocer can, of course, not be accurately determined, but it seems to me that 30 pounds per year per person would be an exceedingly high estimate. This would mean 150 pounds of sugar per family, or almost a pound of sugar every other day per family. If the reduction in duty would cheapen sugar 1 cent a pound, each person would save 30 cents a year, or 2½ cents per month—a sum so insignificant that it would not affect even the poorest classes.

This would leave the balance of 50 pounds per capita which is used in compounds, the prices of which would not be guided by the price of the comparatively small percentage of sugar they contain. This could be verified by comparing the fluctuations in the price of sugar with the prices of the respective compounds.

A lowering of the sugar duties would affect the agricultural interests of over 15 States, besides Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and so forth. The entire cane-sugar and beet-sugar industries would be crippled or destroyed. The Government would lose about $60,000,000 per year and the consumer would not be perceptibly benefited. Practically the only beneficiaries would be the manufacturers of sugar-containing compounds.

It seems that those who favor the present duty should come together and take steps to acquaint the people as well as the Tariff Board with the fundamental facts relating to the sugar industry in this country. This should be done, not merely by presenting opinions and arguments, but by furnishing reliable data and statistics.

Wide publication should be given to this subject in order to enable the people to arrive at a just conclusion as to the existing conditions in this industry and at the same time to render the Tariff Board all possible assistance. I believe that only in this way can the public be convinced that the now existing unjust criticism has no reasonable basis.

That an undertaking of this kind should be placed into the hands of acknowledged and absolutely reliable experts goes without saying. The investigation, in order to be of real value, should be as thorough and imperial as if made by the Government itself, so that it could be used in meeting whatever demands for information might be made by the Tariff Board. The result of such investigation could be published in pamphlet form and arrangements made to give it a very wide distribution. As this tariff question is one of vital importance to all the beet and cane growers in this country it should not be difficult to raise sufficient funds to conduct such investigation on a liberal scale and to provide for a large distribution.

The best available talent should be engaged and their names should be a guaranty of their impartiality and reliability.

The Tariff Board should be consulted and any information it requires should be furnished. There should be no secrecy, no newspaper campaign, no "influential agencies," and so forth. The work should be conducted on a strictly scientific basis and the sole object should be to collect fundamental facts and statistics and thus to assist the Tariff Board and the people to come to intelligent conclusions, instead of being influenced or misled by unfounded statements and assertions made by the "free-sugar" advocates.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment—not the paragraph, but the pending amendment—be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that debate on the pending amendment be now closed?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I object. I want to speak on that amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. ESTOPINAL rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ESTOPINAL] desire to be heard?

Mr. ESTOPINAL. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment close in 10 minutes, so that gentlemen who desire to be heard on this amendment may be recognized for 5 minutes each.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill proposes to place sugar on the free list, and the effect thereof will be to deprive the Government of between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 of revenue annually derived from importations on sugar. As a Representative from the State of Louisiana, which produces most of the cane sugar in this country, I wish to voice an earnest protest against the enactment of this bill into law. If passed, it will result, in my judgment, in the ruin of both the cane and beet industries of continental United States, and I do not believe that the great masses of the citizens of the Republic would receive countervailing benefits to warrant the destruction of such a large amount of property and so much suffering and loss to so many of our people.

In Louisiana and Texas considerably over $100,000,000 is invested in the growth and manufacture of cane sugar, and a larger sum in several of the Northern and Western States in beet sugar. It is difficult to give the exact figures in regard to either one of these industries because so many factors enter therein, but from the best information obtainable I am sure the above estimates are conservative. Moreover, there is no doubt, in my opinion, that the cultivation of both cane and beet sugar on a large scale would cease in this country if this bill becomes a law.

The report accompanying the bill (see p. 5) shows that the cost of producing beet sugar in the United States averages about 3.54 cents per pound, and in Germany about 2.42, or if one-tenth of a cent for freight from Germany to the United States be added, it makes the German sugar laid down in New York cost its producer 2.52 cents. This gives the German beet grower an advantage of 1.02 cents a pound over his American competitor, and surely no one could withstand such opposition as that.

The report does not deign to discuss the cost of producing cane sugar in Louisiana and Texas, nor the effect upon our southern industry of free sugar. However, the report of the Hardwick special committee on the American Sugar Refining Co. and others (see p. 23) shows that it costs an average of 3.75 cents per pound to produce cane sugar in Louisiana and one-half cent to refine it, or 4.25 cents per pound for refined sugar; also, that unrefined sugar is made in Java for 1.50 cents, in the Philippines for 1.75 cents, and in Cuba for 2 cents, so that when half a cent is added for refining, the cost of cane sugar in these countries would be 2, 2¼, and 2½ cents per pound, respectively. It is true, it would cost probably one-eighth of a cent per pound additional to transport sugar from Java and the Philippines into the markets of this country in excess of the cost from Cuba and Louisiana, but that would still give Java, the Philippines, and Cuba an advantage of more than 1½ cents per pound over our Louisiana and Texas producers. It is impossible for them to compete under such conditions and their business would be completely destroyed.

Fully half a million people in Louisiana and Texas are dependent for their daily bread upon the sugar industry, directly or indirectly; upward of $100,000,000 are invested in it; the annual crop of sugar and molasses sells for $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, and its destruction would mean terrible suffering and loss to thousands of people who have never been engaged in any other kind of business, and who can not change the avocation of generations in a moment. If their great industry is to be destroyed they should be given fair warning and allowed time to prepare for the change, and make at least a good beginning in some different line of endeavor. If we must have legislation in regard to sugar there should be a gradual reduction in the duty rather than a radical change from an import rate of nearly 2 cents a pound to free trade. The passage of such a bill as this would give a blow to my State from which it would take many years to recover. The wealthiest parishes are in the sugar belt. The great city of New Orleans is more dependent upon the sugar industry than any other branch of business. A very large percentage of the assessed property wealth of the State is derived from sugar, directly and indirectly, and to destroy it would reduce values enormously. While north Louisiana does not produce sugar, it is vitally interested in it, for we receive very large sums for levees and schools from taxes collected in the rich sugar sections and New Orleans. A tide of immigration is pouring into Louisiana, and property in every locality is rapidly increasing in value. Destroy sugar and it will require many years to establish new industries to take its place. In the meantime immigration will look elsewhere. Development will cease temporarily—we can not say how long. Other States will forge ahead of us, and every Louisianian would be seriously injured.

Moreover, a great many people besides those in Louisiana and the beet-sugar States are directly interested in domestic sugar. It is estimated that in Louisiana alone it costs a million dollars every year to renew the supply of mules, and the sugar planters constitute the best market for the high-priced mules of Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, Missouri, Texas, and Kansas. Factory machinery and supplies, implements, railroad equipment, oil and coal, feedstuffs, peas, and commercial fertilizers, insurance on factories, freights on factory products, and so forth, run annually into several millions in Louisiana, and all these items, except oil and a portion of the insurance, are furnished at profitable prices by the manufacturers, farmers, railroads, and business men of 20 or more States. The twenty-five to thirty millions a year for which the Louisiana sugar crop sells is widely scattered and its benefits divided among a large number of people throughout the Union, who will feel the loss appreciably if this industry be destroyed. The sugar planter is obliged to buy heavily away from home, and everything he consumes is favored by a high tariff. If his product is to be free, then his purchases should be free also.

The platform of my party enacted at the Denver convention did not declare for free trade, but for a gradual reduction of the tariff wherever necessary to reduce it to a revenue basis, and in the preparation of the great wool and steel schedules this course was adopted.

The average reduction on articles of steel and iron in the bill recently passed by the House and now pending in the Senate, below the rates in the Payne-Aldrich bill, was 30 per cent, and the reduction below existing law on manufactures of wool in the bill which passed this House several months ago, during the present Congress, was about 52 per cent. Why make this great distinction against the products of the farm, leaving still a heavy rate of duty on articles made of iron, steel, and wool, but placing sugar on the free list, and thereby destroying it?

In my opinion the laws of supply and demand have far greater influence in fixing the price of food products than the tariff, and it is a fact, so clearly established none can deny it, that whenever there is a scarcity of any great article of food, like meat, flour, or sugar, there is a corresponding rise in prices. We had this forcibly demonstrated last year in the case of sugar, when, as a result of the scarcity in the crop of 1910–11, both in Cuba and Europe, the price of sugar on our markets last summer and fall, before the domestic beet and cane crops of last year became available, was very high, reaching the extreme point of 7½ cents per pound by wholesale in the city of New York, whereas shortly after our beet and cane sugar began to move freely this price dropped nearly 2 cents a pound. Surely the tariff had nothing to do with that. The rise was caused by scarcity of sugar, and the drop by the good crops of last year, which gave ample supply.

Mr. W. P. Willett, of Willett & Gray, New York, who was engaged as an expert by the Hardwick committee because, as stated by Chairman HARDWICK, he is "probably the greatest living American authority on sugar prices," gave some very interesting testimony on this subject, from which I quote:

Congressman SULZER, of New York. What, in your judgment as an expert, could bring about a permanent reduction of the cost of manufactured sugar to the consumers of the United States?

Mr. WILLETT. By increasing the amount of domestic production, and in Porto Rico and Hawaii; that is, by increasing the quantity of sugar within the United States to the extent that we would be required to purchase no sugar whatever at world prices.

Congressman HINDS, of Maine. How much beet sugar did they produce in this country this year?

Mr. WILLETT. Five hundred and fifty thousand tons.

Congressman HINDS. How much do you think that they ought to produce in order to maintain a proper equilibrium of prices here?

Mr. WILLETT. Well, just double that amount will do it. I believe that amount, a million tons, would carry us well below any excess in the world's prices.

Congressman HINDS. And would be a great advantage in giving us independence of Europe?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir; and that is a tremendous advantage. (Pt. 37, p. 3086, of Hearings, et seq.)

And again Mr. Willett said:

* * * This promotion of our industry is a much more vital point (from the consumers' standpoint included) than is a reduction of tariff to a point that lets in foreign sugar and thereby diminishes the home production. Whenever we reach the condition indicated, competition between our free and partially free duty producers will begin and the consumers will benefit thereby and the United States will be entirely free from the speculative and other influences which control the world's price, and it is not unreasonable to expect that under the conditions indicated the United States will become a considerable exporter of its surplus production to the foreign countries which may be short of supplies, as under present conditions abroad.

As showing the ultimate effect of home production equal to or surpassing home consumption, I call attention specially for earnest consideration to the fact that in 1910 we reached this desired consummation within 74,000 tons, and as a result we were almost independent of Europe—so much so, in fact, that we got our supplies from Cuba at over one-half cent per pound under world's prices—during which time one man, Santa Maria, was carrying on a big bull speculation in Europe in which we would certainly have been involved but for this limited amount we required that year. In 1911 the Cuban crop fell short of 1910 by 320,898 tons, and we required 212,182 tons from abroad to complete our supplies; hence we were involved in the world's prices in 1911, and the result was a hue and cry against the high prices of sugar. I am not making an argument but am simply pointing to the facts that appear to me to make the consideration of the increase in our local supplies of greater importance in legislation than a reduction of duties beyond certain limits, those limits to be such as will positively exclude all sugars outside those of our States and dependencies. (Part 43, pp. 3556–57 of hearings.)

In all these analyses I reach the same conclusion—that to decrease the price of sugar to the consumer increase the domestic production as rapidly as possible. (Part 48, p. 3978, of hearings.)

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, also testified before the Hardwick committee in part as follows:

But the point I am giving is this: That under the present system we are absolutely dependent upon the refiners of this country for our sugar. They have taught us to use white sugar and we will not take any other kind, and therefore they can fix any price thereon they please. I will say, on the question of price, that I think they are very reasonable about it and do not try to squeeze us very much. At the same time, whenever the Louisiana sugar comes in the price of sugar drops, and whenever the crop of beet sugar comes in the price of sugar drops. Again, as soon as the Louisiana and beet sugar men sell all they have to sell the price of sugar goes up again.

Congressman FORDNEY. That is true of last summer, I believe.

Dr. WILEY. Yes; and when the price of sugar went up to 7 cents retail, I said, "Watch out; when the sugar crop comes in it will go down," and it did; and there was no sugar in the country even then. (Part 42, p. 3446, of Hearings.)

It will thus be seen that according to Mr. Willett and Dr. Wiley, two very able and disinterested witnesses who are neither refiners nor growers of sugar, the only safe way to secure cheap sugar for the consumer is to encourage and build up a large production of sugar here at home so as to make us independent of foreign markets. To a great extent this has been done, and we now produce in the States about 900,000 tons, or more than one-fourth of our total consumption, while our island possessions produce another one-fourth.

One proof of the correctness of this theory is found in the fact that sugar is and has been reasonable in price for many years. It is the cheapest article of our ordinary food, and the rate of consumption has grown rapidly, until it is about 80 pounds per capita, and we now consume more sugar than any other people except the Britons, who use about 86 pounds per capita per annum. A careful comparison of prices of foodstuffs for the years from 1890 to 1907—the lastest available statistics—shows that while nearly everything, such as butter, cheese, eggs, meats, lard, flour, meal, and so forth, went up materially, the increases ranging from 17 per cent to 57 per cent, sugar was gradually reduced in price, and was actually 20 per cent cheaper in 1907 than in 1890. (Statistical Abstract, United States, for 1910, p. 528.)

Another interesting fact is that sugar is sold to the consumer cheaper in the United States than anywhere on earth, except possibly in Great Britain. We learn from House Document No. 510, Sixty-second Congress, second session, that in November, 1911, sugar retailed abroad at the following prices: Great Britain, 5.5 to 6.3 cents; Germany, 6.5 to 7.8; France, 7.4 to 8.9; Italy, 12.7 to 14.9; Austria, 8.3 to 9.1; Russia, 7.2 to 8.7; the Netherlands, 10.9; and Canada, 6.5 to 7.5 cents. These statistics demonstrate that our tariff on sugar has not made it even keep pace in price with articles whose supply is produced almost wholly in the United States, and that our citizens buy their sugar nearly as cheap per pound as the people of free-trade Great Britain, where wages are lower than with us, and much cheaper than those of any other country. Surely the sugar tariff can not be such a bad thing when a showing like this can be made.

Let us seek now to ascertain the probable effect of free trade in sugar on its cost to the consumer by examining the facts in regard to coffee—another article of practically universal consumption. From 1865 to 1870 coffee paid a duty of 5 cents per pound, when it was reduced to 3 cents, and in May, 1872, it was placed on the free list, where it has since remained. The wholesale prices of coffee on the New York market have been as follows: For the seven years—1865 to 1871, inclusive—19.33, 17.19, 16.14, 10.62, 9.31, 10, and 12.81 cents per pound, respectively—an average price of 13.34 cents. During the first five years of this period the duty was 5 cents a pound and for the other two it was 3 cents. There were big promises of a cheap breakfast table when the act of 1872 placing coffee on the free list was passed, but we find, on the contrary, the following range of prices for coffee for the next seven years—1873 to 1879, inclusive—18.37, 21.25, 18.06, 17.38, 19.44, 16.38, and 14.31, respectively, being an average for the first seven years under free coffee of 17.88 cents per pound as compared with 13.34 cents during the preceding period, or 4.54 cents per pound higher under free trade than before the duty was removed. During the 10 years—1887 to 1896—the price of coffee was 17.85 cents—not much cheap breakfast table in that. For the past 10 years the average wholesale price of coffee has been 9.78 cents. Its price was 6.75 cents in 1902 and 14.35, or more than twice as high, in 1911. Evidently the price of coffee has been affected by causes independent of the import duty thereon.

It is well known that Brazil and other countries impose a heavy export duty on coffee shipped abroad, and I have no doubt that when we removed our import duty on coffee it enabled these countries to collect much higher export rates, thereby benefiting their governments but not giving our people any cheaper coffee. The same thing may happen in regard to sugar in such countries as Cuba and Java, which produce it in very large quantities and so cheaply, if we destroy our home sugar and become entirely dependent for this great necessary on outside markets.

I recall with much interest a visit to Costa Rica several years ago. Many fine coffee plantations were pointed out and we were told that it was one of the principal products of the country. In the capital city, San Jose, is a magnificent theater, said to be excelled by only two others on earth, and it was constructed by the National Government out of the proceeds of an export tax on coffee. We admit coffee free of customs duty into the United States, but the Costa Ricans make our coffee drinkers pay them an export duty on every pound that leaves that country. Suppose Cuba remains independent and produces six to eight million tons of sugar per annum, as some predict it will. What is to prevent it, after our domestic sugar industries have been destroyed by the pending bill, from imposing a heavy export duty on sugar similar to that laid on coffee by Brazil and Costa Rica? In that event there would be no more benefit to us from free sugar than we received from free coffee—none at all.

We have discussed the effect of free sugar on our domestic industries, but what about Porto Rico and Hawaii? What about Cuba, which enjoys such favorable reciprocal treaties with us? Exact data in regard to Porto Rico and Hawaii are difficult to obtain, but I am informed by well-posted men that a very serious blow would be given to both of these islands if sugar be made free. Porto Rico now produces nearly 300,000 tons of sugar—almost as much as Louisiana—and the industry is a thriving one; but conditions for growing cane in that island are not as favorable as in Cuba, and if the Cuban sugar can come in free, profits on the Porto Rican article will be very much reduced. Moreover, Porto Rico now enjoys a fine trade in coffee with Cuba, selling there nearly one-half of its entire production of coffee at our preferential rate of 20 per cent less duty than that which coffee from other countries has to pay. Coffee is the principal product of Porto Rico and Cuba her best customer. Brazil can raise coffee cheaper than Porto Rico; and if our reciprocal trade with Cuba be destroyed by this bill, a result which must necessarily follow if sugar becomes free, Brazilian coffee would drive the Porto Rican article out of the Cuban market. Hence, both the sugar and coffee trade of Porto Rico will be badly injured.

I am assured by representatives of the Hawaiian people that while a few of their best improved plantations may be able to raise sugar in competition with the beet sugar of Germany and the cane of Java and Cuba, the great mass of Hawaiian cane growers will be forced to quit business if sugar is admitted free.

A most serious situation arises in connection with Cuba, and one which gives me, as a southern man, very deep concern. Close students of affairs on the island—men who have lived there for many years and are thoroughly posted—question very seriously whether or not the Cubans can raise and export sugar as cheap as the Germans, especially when one considers the magnificent railroads, waterways, and terminal facilities in Germany and the power of that great Government, through its State ownership of railroads, to assist the exports it is trying to exploit by extraordinarily cheap freights. We are now buyers of all the Cuban sugar, which comes in at an import rate 20 per cent lower than their foreign competitors have to pay, and this gives them a great advantage in selling to us. Moreover, we sell to them annually about $60,000,000 of various kinds of merchandise under a treaty which favors us between 20 and 40 per cent. The fact that we buy from them all of their great sugar crop and sell them such a large percentage of what they need makes very close relation between the two countries and enables us to keep in close touch with them. If our treaty with Cuba be abrogated by this bill—and there can be no other result—if other countries, particularly Java and Germany, can send their sugars here on exactly the same terms as Cuba; if the world can trade with Cuba on the same terms as ourselves, then the best market for their sugar will be taken from them; and this, together with the hurly-burly of competing rivalry among the merchants of many lands striving for the Cuban trade, is liable to cause much dissension, confusion, and national loss. In this event there is very apt to be such intestinal trouble as to create revolution, which will render it necessary for us to intervene, and our flag will never be lowered if it is ever again raised there at the head of a hostile force.

I would regard the annexation of Cuba as a terrible calamity to the Caucasian race in this country. We already have not only in the South but in many other parts of the Union a very difficult and complex race problem. In the Southern States every effort is being made to maintain the purity of Caucasian blood, and strenuous laws exist everywhere to prevent admixture of the races. In Cuba there is no racial distinction. Genuine Caucasians and people of negro blood intermingle in the freest manner, intermarry at will, and one race socially and otherwise is just as good as the other. If Cuba be annexed we may reasonably expect to see it become a sovereign State of the Union with a few years, equal in every respect to all others. What then would become of our boasted racial purity and social distinctions on account thereof, with such conditions in one of our sister States as prevail universally in Cuba today? God forbid that such a situation should ever confront us!

Let us take a hasty glance at the history of our sugar-tariff legislation. In 1789, when the first tariff act of the new Republic was passed, a duty of 1 to 3 cents per pound was laid on importations of foreign sugar, and in every successive tariff act, with but one exception, from that day to this a duty has been imposed on sugar. The exception was the McKinley Act of 1890, which in lieu of a duty gave a bounty of 2 cents a pound, and even in that act there was a duty of half a cent per pound on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard.

In 1790 the rate was fixed at 1½ to 5 cents per pound; 1½ to 3 cents in 1795; large ad valorem additions thereto in 1800 and 1812; 3 to 12 cents in 1816; 2½ to 3½ cents in 1832; 2½ to 6 cents in 1842; 30 per cent ad valorem in 1846 (the Walker tariff); 24 per cent in 1857; 2½ to 8 cents and upward in the war tariffs of 1861, 1862, and 1864; 1¾ to 4 cents in 1870; 25 per cent in addition to pending rate in 1875; 1.40 to 3.50 cents in 1883; under No. 16 Dutch standard, free, one-half cent per pound duty on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard, and a bounty of 2 cents a pound on all sugar in 1890 (McKinley); 40 per cent ad valorem and one-eighth cent a pound additional on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in 1894 (Wilson); 0.95 to 1.95 cents in 1897 (Dingley); and 0.95 to 1.90 cents in 1909—the present Payne-Aldrich law.

During the 8 years that Thomas Jefferson, the Father of Democracy, occupied the White House—1801 to 1809—the duty on sugar was 1½ to 3 cents a pound; in the 16 years' incumbency of those two great Democrats, Madison and Monroe—1809 to 1825—it was from 3 to 12 cents; when Old Hickory, the Democrat of Democrats, ruled supreme, followed by his special pet, Van Buren—1829 to 1841—it was 3 to 12 cents and then 2½ to 3½ cents; the Walker 30 per cent ad valorem of 1846 came under the Democrat, Polk—1845 to 1849; the second ad valorem, 24 per cent, was during the régime of Buchanan; and under Cleveland we had the 40 per cent of the Wilson Act, with one-eighth cent a pound additional on sugars above No. 16 Dutch standard. During this long period of 124 years the Democrats have held the Presidency for 56 years, and never under a Democrat has there been free sugar, but always a duty on it which brought large revenues and incidentally gave sufficient protection to materially assist the struggling industry.

At the present time sugar is our best revenue producer, yielding annually about fifty-two millions, and it is the fairest and most uniformly distributed of all national taxes. Every citizen contributes his share, for everyone eats sugar from the babe in its cradle to the old man tottering on the grave. The cardinal principle of taxation is equality and uniformity, and it is hard to find anything that more truly embodies this principle than our customs duty on sugar.

Having shown the disastrous effects of free trade in sugar upon our domestic industry, our insular possessions, and Cuba; having proved that the price of sugar is cheaper in proportion than most articles of food, and that no just complaint can be made on that score; and having pointed out the consistent national policy of a good rate of duty on sugar since the birth of the Republic, I now wish to ask whence comes the great agitation to have sugar placed on the free list? Is it the bona fide action of the American consumer who believes he is oppressed by the price of this commodity and hopes to get relief from Congress, or is it the result of a well-planned scheme by the sugar refiners? The Ways and Means Committee, and a great many other Members of Congress have been flooded by petitions and telegrams asking for free sugar, but it is significant that all of these petitions appear to be on prepared sheets of perforated yellow paper, sent out by Frank C. Lowry, sales agent of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. Mr. Lowry has been carrying on a systematic campaign in the interest of free sugar, pretending to represent a committee of wholesale grocers, but when questioned in regard to it (see part 19, Hardwick Hearings, pp. 16 and 17, et seq.) he admitted there was no such organization, and that the sum of $12,000 spent in the distribution of free-sugar literature was furnished by the Federal Sugar Refining Co.

Mr. Claus A. Spreckels, president of this company, testified as follows:

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Spreckels, you have been carrying on a campaign to reduce the tariff as beneficial to the cane-sugar refiners.

Mr. SPRECKELS. I have.

Mr. HINDS. Of course, that will be damaging to the beet-sugar refiners?

Mr. SPRECKELS. To some extent it will. (Pt. 27, p. 2275 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. Now, Mr. Spreckels, it was testified in Washington that the movement for lowering the tariff on sugar, the movement which is going on now and in which you were interested, that your company had expended $12,000 for literature, etc.

Mr. SPRECKELS. Possibly. I do not know what the amount is. I dare say we have. (Pt. 27, p. 2276 of hearings.)

One of my colleagues from the South told me that just before this bill came up in the Democratic caucus he received 19 telegrams from business men in his city urging him to support a big reduction in the tariff duties on sugar and that they were induced to wire him by Frank C. Lowry. This is another case of the Greeks bearing gifts, and, just as the Trojans found the Grecian horse to be their ruin, so will the American people who expect cheap sugar from these Sugar Trust advocates of free trade be sadly disappointed. It is like the devil quoting Scripture for the multimillionaire sugar refiner, Claus Spreckels, and his agents to spend $12,000 of money, wrung from the public by exorbitant prices when sugar crops were short, to fool innocent citizens into believing they are injured by the sugar tariff. It is a scurvy trick, but it seems to have deceived a good many Congressmen.

I am greatly surprised at the apparent solicitude of the Ways and Means Committee for the sugar refiners. On page 5 of the report attached to the pending bill the committee says:

Beet sugar leaves the first manufacturing establishment in a refined condition, but all cane sugar, which constitutes about four-fifths of our consumption must be refined; consequently the refining interest is the most important factor connected with sugar manufacturing in the United States. Therefore the industrial position of refining requires primary consideration. The ability of the refiners to compete with other countries without the aid of tariff protection can not be successfully denied.

They prove this statement by a long quotation from the testimony of this same Mr. Claus A. Spreckels; and although they attempt to show that the sugar-refining business constitutes a great trust, their conclusion, in substance, is that the refiners need protection from the rapacity of the beet-sugar producers, and therefore sugar must be placed on the free list. Take it all in all, this report is the most remarkable document I ever perused, and it is sad for a Democrat to see his party thus playing into the hands of a gigantic trust and destroying a business in which hundreds of thousands of American farmers and manufacturers are engaged in order to give heavier profits to a set of refiners who are already overburdened with wealth.

I can not believe such a thing was intended by my fellow Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee, but beyond question that will be the result if this bill becomes a law. There will probably be a heavy reduction in the retail price of sugar for three or four years, until all our domestic growers of beets and cane have been driven into other pursuits, and then the refiners will charge what they please, for we will be entirely at their mercy. Nearly four-fifths of the sugar we use is made from cane, and most of it is not really a merchantable article until it has passed through the processes of these big refiners. We are beginning to refine in our Louisiana mills, and all beet sugar is refined at the local factories. Put these two agencies out of business and the Sugar Trust will have no competition. Small wonder that the refiners are so anxious for sugar to be on the free list!

In conclusion I desire to say that the proposed measure is un-Democratic and revolutionary. Our great Democratic Party, which has been in existence since the beginning of this Government, has never stood for any such wholesale destruction of private interests and complete ruin to farming communities and such gross injustice to hundreds of thousands of our best citizens in the interest of a few dozen rich men as the enactment of this measure at the behest of the sugar refiners would mean. We have never stood for free trade, nor have any of our party platforms so declared, but always for a tariff for revenue, and if incidental protection accompanied such a tariff there was no objection to it.

The Denver platform was very specific for a gradual reduction of such tariff schedules as is necessary to reduce them to a revenue basis; and there has been so much reduction in the sugar tariff during recent years by the free admission of 300,000 tons of Philippine sugar, the 20 per cent reduction in favor of Cuba, and the lowering of duties in the Payne-Aldrich bill that the present tariff, so far as sugar is concerned, is on an ideal revenue basis, which can not be improved upon; hence there is no reason for any further change in it. If the extreme view be taken, however, that sugar is a hothouse plant, as some are pleased to call it, then it has been fostered for 124 years by every party that has controlled this Government, and to remove this fatherly care at one fell swoop would be heartless in the extreme, for it means quick and certain death. I can not believe that the majority of my party stands for any such act of vandalism. It is not required by any platform pledge, but, on the contrary, violates the implied promise of our leaders at Denver not to make radical changes, but only gradual reductions in tariff schedules. If we hope to elect a President next fall, we must convince the American people that we are sane, constructive statesmen and not rash destroyers of conditions that have existed since the Republic was born. We should make haste slowly in measures of such far-reaching magnitude.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ESTOPINAL] is recognized.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Chairman, this is probably the first time in the history of American legislation that we have sought to pass a law to deliberately wipe out a planting industry, and in this particular case it is one of large importance now, with a promise of future development limited only by a great and increasing demand. And, moreover, in this particular case we propose to destroy an industry which wields more influence on other industries and other productions than it directly benefits those who are engaged in it. To produce and haul cane and manufacture it into marketable sugar requires costly machinery and large numbers of mules and horses, making it a source of splendid trade stimulation to both the manufacturer of costly machinery and the farmer who raises stock for the market. In a report on beet sugar made by the Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. James Wilson, in 1909, he says:

> As this industry develops in the West, it is the main feature, attracting and supporting many things and uniting them in an intensive agricultural husbandry. As it works out in the West, it is the "mother lode" of agricultural development.

Which shows that beet-sugar production has the same stimulating effect.

But, Mr. Chairman, the whole trend of modern political thought and action in this country seems to be to hit something. This tendency runs, I will say in exemplification, the whole gamut of abysmal energy, from the "big stick" of the United States to the bigwig committee of this House; and as "death loves a shining mark," this bigwig committee has hit out at a mark which shines as luminously, as warmingly, and as growingly on the present and future prosperity of this country as the noonday sun shines on the fine and fallow and fertile farms of our charming Pelican State. And we are called upon to strike down these "mother lodes" of domestic sugar production, which permeate so fruitfully every feature of American industrial life and which promises multiplied commercial effects as the stream of domestic output grows larger and larger.

Of all the sugar we consume—more than three and one-third million tons—less than 200,000 tons are imported from countries which pay to us the full existing rate of duty. We are fostering a magnificent trade by giving free entrance of sugar from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, and we are giving a differential to Cuba which is expanding our trade with that fertile island. Our total exports to these noncontiguous territories and Cuba were last year more than $140,000,000, having grown with great rapidity under the impulse of this favored legislation regarding sugar.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to estimate the influence which the development of sugar production and our sugar traffic is having on other productions and on the industries of the country. As I have just said, it reaches out into every avenue of trade as a vitalizing and sustaining influence. In addition to our cane-sugar production of nearly 800,000,000 pounds we have grown from a small output of beet sugar, which 20 years ago required but 7,155 acres, to a total in 1910 of over 1,000,000,000 pounds, requiring almost 500,000 acres of land. If we destroy this domestic production and disorganize our trade with the islands of the eastern and western oceans, we shall have struck a blow at our national prosperity far beyond any good effects to the country that the saving of 1½ cents a pound would have even at this time. And if we place our large demand for sugar at the mercy of foreign raisers and the big refineries on the seaboard, even a small apparent good may be wiped out by some process of combination, which would leave us without our industry, with its stimulation and ramifications, and compel us to pay more for our sugar than we are now paying.

When it is known that we have in the United States, as estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture, at least 274,000,000 acres of land adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet, and that of the three and one-third million tons we consume we are now producing of beet sugar considerably more than 1,000,000,000 pounds, or over one-seventh of our consumption, from less than 500,000 acres, we gain a faint idea of what we are called upon to sacrifice in the way of possible national energies in production in this bill.

Then, Mr. Chairman, in considering this effort for a microscopic contribution to a free breakfast table we must remember that there are other features of our national consumption which must be considered in this connection. The raising of beets to produce sugar contributes largely to the cattle-raising industry of this country. With the development of the beet-sugar industry, the decrease in the price of meats, so earnestly desired, might easily mean more to the average citizen than the saving on the small amount of sugar which he consumes. The report of the Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. James Wilson, in 1909, bears convincingly on this point. He says in that report:

> The sugar industry has had a remarkable influence in the stimulation, elevation, and improvement generally of the live-stock interests. This has occurred in bettering the breeds, increasing the number of stock, and multiplying the productive resources of the stock industry. It has turned vast areas from simple grazing to stock production for all purposes, from producing the "stocker" to producing a good quality of meat for consumption, also dairy and creamery products and breeding fine blooded animals of different kinds.

Note that he speaks also of its stimulating effects to increase dairy and creamery products, another article of universal use, for which the people have been suffering for the lack of larger production.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that, even with the domestic output reaching to a total of more than one and three-quarters billions of pounds, we are but in the bridle path, yet this bridle path leads out, unerringly, into the broad highway of national progress if we destroy not the bridges which must afford the means of reaching it. And for what gain do we seek to burn these bridges which enable us to reach and travel this highway of national progress? Our total consumption of sugar per capita is a little over 80 pounds. Of this it is estimated that 50 pounds goes into manufacturing, which is sold to the consumer at prices which preclude the idea of reduction in the price of the manufactured article on account of the small tariff saving. This leaves 30 pounds per capita used in the family as sugar. Granted that we save the 1½ cents per pound, which is shown to be the increase which the tariff causes, we have a total apparent saving of 45 cents per capita, or $2.25 for a family of five persons, per annum, and with the wiping out of nearly one-fifth of our consumption, and one-seventeenth of the world's supply, by the destruction of this local production of beet and cane sugar there is bound to be an appreciable effect in the rise of prices, somewhat akin to the disturbance of last year.

But assuming that the saving to the consumer be the full 1½ cents per pound, or $2.25 for the average family; when we know the economic liberality, in expenditure, of the average American family, and reckon the tremendous effects which the national increase in sugar production would inevitably exert on the industrial and economic situation of this country in the next 10 or 12 years, this supposed gain might easily prove to be a most disastrous loss. Substantial relief to the consumer of the country from such trifling saving which involves so many national losses, in so many ways, is out of the question, and we will be but playing to the galleries if we try it.

Sugar is the one product of the farms of the country which has not engaged in the race for the goal of high prices. It is the one product which has consistently maintained its friendship for the men of moderate means, for it has gone lower and lower, decade after decade. Mr. Truman G. Palmer furnishes us with the following figures:

> In 1870 the average New York wholesale price of standard granulated sugar was 10.7 cents per pound; in 1880, 8.81 cents; 1890, 6.27 cents; 1900, 5.32 cents; 1910, 4.97 cents.

Why slaughter such an amiable and consistent friend? Why not take him by the hand and give him support in his efforts to be the Santa Claus to both the commercial progress of the country and to the consumer, that he may continue to shower gifts on both?

Why, Mr. Chairman, I have known him since I was a small boy. He has grown immensely in size since then, but kinder and kinder to the people. And in addition to his unremitting efforts to serve the people more equitably than his brothers in production, he has paid since I have known him, nearly $2,000,000,000 toward the support of our Government. Surely he deserves not this attack in the house of his friends. I say in the house of his friends advisedly, for an import duty on sugar has ever been a Democratic duty, for it has always been one which has afforded a maximum of revenue with a minimum of protection.

Now, let me say another thing, Mr. Chairman, for the thoughtful consideration of the Members on this side from the cotton-growing South. If we destroy the cane-sugar industry of Louisiana to what must we turn? Inevitably it must be cotton, for the sugar lands of my State are ideal cotton lands which will produce a bale to the acre. Already we have heard a Member state on this floor that he had plowed under a part of his crop, it not being profitable to even gather it at the prices prevailing at that time. What would be the effect of adding a half of a million bales to our present enormous production; and how would the possible saving of $2.25 for each family balance against the certain lowering of the price on 14,000,000 bales of cotton?

Mr. Chairman, the stream of money that the enacting of this bill into law would take from this country, and the loss of the developing and prosperity-bringing influence which the production of sugar is having now, and which it will have more largely if not disturbed, means much to our future, and there can be no real offset to these certain losses. [Applause.]

[By unanimous consent Mr. ESTOPINAL was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this amendment has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PROUTY, Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania, Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin, and Mr. LENROOT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] is recognized.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, strike out the words "free of duty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at a duty of 1¼ cents per pound."

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I have been reading for some two weeks every article of literature I could get on the sugar question. I have been listening for two days patiently to the arguments upon this floor for the single purpose of determining in my own mind one question, and that is, How low a duty could be placed upon sugar without destroying the American industries? I have reached a conclusion in my own mind as a result of all the arguments that the American industries could be preserved with a tariff of 1¼ cents per pound. I know there has been a little conflict in the testimony given on this floor, but I accept substantially the statement made by the chairman of the committee that has been investigating the sugar question [Mr. HARDWICK]. Last evening, in response to a direct question, he stated that if this bill went into effect, in his judgment it would wipe out the beet-sugar industry in this country.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the gentleman will not misquote me.

Mr. PROUTY. All I have to say in regard to that is that I ask him to put it in the RECORD. All I ask of him now is to put it in the RECORD just as the shorthand notes show it, and I will appeal to the House as to whether he is right or whether I am right.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The shorthand notes will not be changed to even the dotting of an "i."

Mr. PROUTY. Then it is a question of your memory and mine.

Mr. HARDWICK. You are wrong.

Mr. PROUTY. I sat behind you and listened to you myself, and I will stake my reputation upon this floor that you stated substantially just what I have said.

Mr. HARDWICK. Substantially?

Mr. PROUTY. I do not claim to quote the exact words; but you said, in response to a question by a gentleman on this side of the House, that, in your opinion, it would wipe out the sugar industry, or words to that effect. In reply to a question as to cane sugar, you said you did not know whether it could survive or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said that, and not me. I think it will probably wipe out Louisiana sugar.

Mr. PROUTY. That is what I said.

Mr. HARDWICK. You said "beet sugar" just now. You can not keep your own statements together. It will wipe out cane sugar, or most of it.

Mr. PROUTY. You said, substantially, that, in your opinion, it would ultimately wipe out both. Well, everybody who knows me is aware of the fact that I have for years believed we ought to have a tariff in this country just as low as possible in order to protect American labor and American industries.

I am frank to say that I have felt that some of my brethren with whom I agree absolutely on the theory of protection have placed a tariff on some things too high, but I never have and I never will stand in this House and vote for any measure that I believe will wipe out American industries and leave us absolutely at the mercy of Europe. [Applause on the Republican side.] Everybody who is familiar with the situation knows that there is a great international syndicate that controls sugar in the Old World, and they limit absolutely the amount that may be exported. Now, suppose there happens just what these gentlemen substantially admit will happen, that this industry will be wiped out in this country, and that syndicate says it will not allow any more sugar to be shipped over here. How are you going to feed the hungry people in this country?

A MEMBER. Raise more beets.

Mr. PROUTY. Raise more beets? The industry is gone. I still adhere to the old doctrine of Abraham Lincoln, that if we buy our sugar in Germany they will have our money and we will have the sugar, but if you raise it in this country we will have both the money and the sugar. The Democratic theory would enrich Germany but impoverish America. I am for America. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania, Mr. GUERNSEY, Mr. GOOD, and Mr. RIVERA rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. RIVERA] is recognized.

Mr. RIVERA. Mr. Chairman, the place which my country holds in this debate is really singular. If the Congress should approve the complete suppression of the sugar tariff, the sugar-producing States such as Louisiana, Colorado, and others would suffer more or less in their interests, and their business would diminish to some extent; but they would, nevertheless, continue their commercial life and the development of their economical resources, and so compensate the loss which they would suffer. Porto Rico is in a very different position. The inclusion of sugar in the free list is equivalent to the immediate ruin of an industry that, within a conservative estimation, represents three-quarters of the agricultural production and the commercial movement of the island.

Under the favorable conditions created by free trade between the United States and Porto Rico, the sugar plantations and sugar-manufacturing industries grew with extraordinary rapidity during the last decade. In 1901, 68,909 tons of raw sugar were exported. In 1910, 284,522 tons were exported. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a brief statistical note which shall show the growth of the exportation of this article during the period to which I am referring:

Sugar exports.

Fiscal year.	Tons.	Value.	Average price per ton.
1901	68,909	$4,715,611	$68.43
1902	91,912	5,890,302	64.08
1903	113,106	7,470,122	66.04
1904	129,647	8,690,814	67.03
1905	135,663	11,925,804	87.90
1906	205,277	14,184,667	69.10
1907	204,079	14,770,682	72.37
1908	234,607	18,099,504	76.52
1909	244,257	18,432,446	75.46
1910	284,522	23,545,922	82.75

From this statistical summary it appears that the total amount of sugar exported grew fourfold in 10 years, while the value of this product was fivefold more by reason of the rise in the prices, which in 1901 was, as an average, that of $66.43 and in 1910 that of $82.75 per ton. In 1901 the raw sugar of Porto Rico in its total output was sold for $4,715,611. In 1910 it was sold for $23,545,922. And as the duties per hundred pounds are $1.65 and per ton $33, as a result we find that in the total exportation of the island in 1910 was benefited in the sum of $9,389,226.

The value of the total exportation of products from Porto Rico to the United States during the year 1910 was that of $32,095,897. So $23,545,922 in sugar were exported, and in other products, such as tobacco, coffee, fruits, and so forth, $8,549,975 were exported; we here, as I said before, find that the total amount produced by sugar is three-quarters of the total amount of the whole production of the island.

Now, then, the average cost of production of sugar per hundred pounds is estimated at $2.50 and the average price of sale for 10 years, according to the most exact statistics, is $72.96 per ton and $3.65 per hundred pounds; if we deduct $1.65, which is the benefit derived from the present tariff, the agriculturist receives only $2 per hundred pounds, or, in other words, 50 cents less than it costs him to produce them. A loss of this kind means absolute impossibility of continuing the cultivation of sugar cane and the manufacture of sugar. And the absolute certainty that in a very short period the prosperity which

Porto Rico had reached within the last 10 years in virtue of its perseverent efforts and its wonderful activities, which had forced an island of 3,600 square miles to reach a commercial importance of $80,000,000, and thus to occupy the seventh place in commerce among the Latin-American, would disappear.

In the year 1899 a modern factory was established in the southern valleys, between Ponce and Guayama—the Central Aguirre; in the year 1890 another large factory was established in the plains to the southeast, between Ponce and Mayaguez. These were followed a few years later by a third factory, in Fajardo, at the northeast. The three of them owe their existence to American capital, and they are valued at more than $10,000,000. Simultaneously and encouraged by the example, native capital commenced to be invested in the sugar business until it was converted into an unextinguishable source of life and progress. At present, it may be assured without exaggeration of any sort, that the Porto Rican and American capital invested in this manufacture is over $80,000,000, one-half of which is invested in lands and plantations, the other in buildings and machineries. The $37,000,000 corresponding to the investment in machinery would be irredeemably lost if any paralyzation should occur, and this would happen if sugar were included in the free list.

The $38,000,000 corresponding to the inversion made in lands and plantations would decrease by from 40 to 70 per cent. Acres of land which are now sold and bought at $200 would then be worth from $80 to $100. Therefore no less than $56,000,000 would be the cost to the American and Porto Rican capitalists of the measures which I am now discussing in this House. The gentlemen who are to decide with their votes such a serious matter as this is will readily understand that it is necessary to meditate and weigh the pros and cons of this subject very calmly before deciding the fate of an industry on which is based the welfare of a people to whom even the right of voting is denied, while the subject of the discussion is its principal element of vitality.

But there is something more important still. As in the course of 10 years the industry developed and the production quadruplicated, there was more labor required, and wages were raised. The laborer who before 1901 earned 40 cents for his day's work now, in 1912, receives 60 cents and 70 cents. If the field of activity is limited and the type of wages decreased, 100,000 laborers will be without work, and the doors of emigration or beggary will be opened for them; another 100,000 would continue working, perhaps, but under the old rate of wages, without the cost of living—which in 1912 is much more expensive—being reduced parallelly. Free sugar, therefore, signifies, in so far as the laborer of the island is concerned, not a possibility nor a probability, but a certainty of future conflicts and terrible sufferings.

It is convenient to note, on the other hand, the circumstance that the reduction in exportation would be accompanied by a reduction in importation. Porto Rico has an annual income of $10,000,000 on account of the tariff, which opens in the United States an excellent market for its raw sugar, its tobacco, its fruits, for all its products excepting coffee, which already figures in the free list and has no protection whatever. But the merchandise imported during 1911 from the United States into Porto Rico amounted to $34,671,958, and, naturally, the national industries obtain a benefit not less than that obtained by the island. Therefore we are not receiving any gift; it is a transaction of mutual benefit that is no more than just. If Porto Rico should sell less and buy less, the national agriculture and commerce would be greatly affected when the $35,000,000 which they now sell to the Porto Ricans were reduced to $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. The following statistic notes demonstrate the rise of our purchases in the American markets:

From the United States:

1903	12,245,845
1905	13,974,074
1907	25,686,285
1908	22,677,378

As is seen, the increase is progressive and incessant. Porto Rico, if existing conditions do not vary, will buy of the United States $50,000,000 annually in 1915. If existing conditions do change, then it will buy one-quarter of what it now purchases. And the American producers will undoubtedly suffer the consequences and be prejudiced.

I am obliged to call the attention of the House to another view of the problem—to its political aspect. It is 14 years since the American people occupied the island of Porto Rico and 12 years from the date of the approval of the Foraker Act. This act, as its own title demonstrates, was of temporary character; but, nevertheless, it is still the constitution by which the island is governed, although the Porto Ricans insistently and in all forms, year after year, have been asking Congress to vote for their country a more liberal organic law, which should be more in harmony with the advance of contemporaneous progress and the character of democracy in America.

In Porto Rico the legislative power works under the control of a sort of insular senate, which is called Executive Council, and whose members are appointed by the President of the United States. The efforts of the representatives of the people are always met and crushed by the resistance from this semi-bureaucratical body, which first makes the laws and afterwards apply them if they believe it convenient, or do not apply them if it is deemed better to overlook or forget them.

The executive power is wholly exercised by the governor and his cabinet. The people do not know the tribute they pay, nor are they able to enforce a correct application of the law; and when they protest and make any claim against such conditions they are answered that they are not prepared, because such is the information given to the Federal Government by its agents in the island, who are not disposed to lose the absolute control which the Foraker Act gives them.

The disgust is great, and must be so, among those who are under such regimen, which would be applied and maintained only by a military and aristocratic nation, but which no federation of free and democratic states would apply and uphold.

A party for the independence of the island is at present being organized, and it is based on the growing political discontentment and on the well-founded discouragement of the people. If to this political uneasiness we add the bankruptcy which the ruin of the sugar industry would bring, the country would raise its unanimous protestation to Congress requesting one of the two following solutions:

An ample system of self-government which will enable the country not only to organize its own administration and vote its own laws but also to make its own treaties with other nations and provide good markets for its products.

Or a complete national independence, with or without the protectorate of the United States, which will permit the country, free from all economical or political restrictions, to unfold its own initiatives and to develop its own resources—in one word, to become the owner of itself, as our neighbor, the island of Cuba, is.

The Porto Ricans, even the most ardent lovers of independence, confide in the American people and know that the Congress of the United States will not commit the great injustice of depriving them of the advantages of a protective tariff for the insular products which the island exports and which are consumed here so long as the protective tariff for the products that are exported from here and are there consumed be continued.

By suppressing the duties on sugar the annual benefit of $10,000,000 which our industries now receive would also be suppressed and the United States would then receive $10,000,000 without giving anything in exchange.

Porto Rico expectantly awaits that Congress give one more proof of its high capacity and noble rectitude by avoiding the ruin of a country almost without hope and which has no means of defense. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment to the paragraph be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not on the paragraph, but on the pending amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on the pending amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to close debate on the pending amendment in five minutes, so that the gentleman can come in.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak against the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask that debate close on the pending amendment in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized.

[Mr. FOWLER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is idle for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to quibble about the statement he has made here on the floor. That distinguished gentleman sat for months at the head of an important committee of this House, taking testimony, and with what result? Every line of that report, every table that is contained in it, every statement that is found therein, not even excepting those of the employees of the Sugar Trust itself, contradicts the statements that have been made by the gentleman and his colleagues upon the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the gentleman on his familiarity with the subject. He evidently knows nothing about it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. O Mr. Chairman, I have read the report.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the gentleman read any page of the record? Will the gentleman cite any statement that I have made on this floor that is not substantiated by that record?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will cite the gentleman's statement here that the beet-sugar industry would not be wiped out, together with the statement in his report that sugar could be raised in Java at a cost of 1½ cents. My colleague from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] has shown from this report that beet sugar could be produced in Germany at more than a cent a pound less than in the United States. Yet the gentleman from Georgia says now on the floor, after taking testimony to the contrary on that subject, "such will not be the result." Out of your own mouth you are convicted.

And this explains, Mr. Chairman, why it is that our friends on the other side are not ready now to have any hearings or any testimony taken on the subject. They never intended to get it at this time. They started in with the purpose and intent of investigating something else. something entirely different, and they have incidentally gotten facts which they do not want and which they now undertake to repudiate upon this floor.

I want to quote here again from the testimony taken before the committee of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was the chairman, to contradict a statement to the effect that the full amount of duty was paid by the American consumer. This is taken from the record that the gentleman himself has made, and, inasmuch as there is some dispute about the figures and computations on this matter, I propose to establish the contrary beyond all controversy by citing an actual trade sale.

On the 31st day of March, 1910, or during the two weeks prior to that time 25,000,000 pounds of granulated sugar were sold for export to London at the price of $3.60 per hundred in bond f. o. b. at New York. Upon that there was a drawback which is given upon granulated sugar, amounting to $1.90, making the total price which was received for the sugar $5.55 per hundred pounds. During the two weeks in which that sugar was sold the price on the New York market, as given by the reports filed by the gentleman from Georgia and submitted by his own committee here to us, ranged from $5.10 to $5.20, so that the price below the European parity at that time was from 40 to 45 cents.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think that one transaction settles the prices?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, because if I had time I would read from the gentleman's own report a statement that that condition continued for all but two months of that year, and only during two months was the price here above the European parity. I favor this amendment because I believe it gives a fair and reasonable protection to the American producer. [Applause on the Republican side].

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GREEN of Iowa and Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 45, noes 76.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire how many Members there are on that side of the House who desire to offer amendments to the paragraph.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the gentleman proceeds, I should like to ask how many real amendments there are which gentlemen desire to offer.

Mr. GOOD. I have one.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the amendment

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the amendments to this paragraph close at a quarter after 4 o'clock.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I hope gentlemen who have indicated their desire to offer amendments will not be cut off.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman does not have an opportunity otherwise, that he may do so.

Mr. WARBURTON. I should like to be heard.

Mr. MONDELL. Can not the gentleman make the time a little later and close debate at half past 4 on this paragraph?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will make the request that the debate on this paragraph close at half past 4, and that a vote be taken then on all pending amendments, and that gentlemen may be recognized to offer amendments when they speak.

Mr. MANN. The amendments to be pending.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph, for the reason that the manner in which this bill has been brought into this House indicates that it should not receive the support of any Member on either side of the aisle.

On the 2d day of this month the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced into this House the present bill. That was on Saturday afternoon. Sunday intervened, and Monday was the next working day, that being the 4th of March. On the morning of Tuesday the bill was reported back to this House, accompanied by a report, after the lapse of one single working day, with the statement that—

> The Committee on Ways and Means have given a great deal of time and consideration to this special feature of the sugar schedule—

A bill involving $53,000,000 of revenue, a bill affecting thousands of employees and $200,000,000 of invested American capital, a bill affecting the people of the United States everywhere under the American flag, introduced in the House and with the lapse of a single working day shot back into the House and then forced through under motions stifling debate. On the 4th of March, one year before their Waterloo, the men behind this bill met, and, according to the committee report, disposed not only of this bill in the Ways and Means Committee, but also of a bill affecting the incomes and business of the American people. The gentleman from Alabama also states, in the report on the income-tax bill, that it is made—

> After a very thorough investigation of the field of revenue possibilities—

A very thorough investigation being made between Saturday night and Tuesday morning, and, as I understand it, in harmony with the proceeding on the sugar bill, this income-tax bill, which is called its twin companion, was introduced into the Democratic caucus and adopted without even being read. And these are the gentlemen who have been temporarily swept into power on the cry of "gag rule" in the Congress of the United States. Are we to legislate by Congress or by political party caucus, in which you do not permit even the reading of proposed legislation affecting the American people?

Your committee report further states, or rather the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated in the debate, that they would make up this deficiency of $53,000,000 by taxing what he called the "grand idle capital" of the United States. And yet the declared purpose of your revenue bill is to tax business. When did idle capital become business?

I say to you that if this legislation and the other bills which have been introduced by gentlemen on that side of the House become laws there will be plenty of future discussion of idle capital and idle labor on this floor. The American Republic will have an abundance of both. From one end of it to the other distress and disaster will follow if these measures, introduced and driven through the House in this undigested form, become law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Haphazard methods of legislation, such as this, are repugnant to the entire country. The preponderance of opinion among the American people to-day is in favor of the revision of tariff schedules in the future after and in pursuance of a scientific investigation of the subject by a high-minded, efficient, bipartisan tariff board, such as we have found in the present body in charge of that important governmental work.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill, because I believe it will afford a considerable measure of relief to the American people who are staggering under the heavy burden of excessive Federal taxation; and also because we have found a fairer, more equitable, and less burdensome method of raising the revenue which will be lost by the passage of this bill; that is, by taxing wealth by what is known as the excise tax, a tax on net incomes of more than $5,000. By the passage of these two bills the burden will be shifted from the shoulders of the weak to those of the strong. It is a cardinal principle of the Democratic Party that the expense of maintaining the Government, both Federal and State, should be divided in proportion to the ability to pay of those who are taxed. It has been clearly shown and conclusively proven by members of the Ways and Means Committee who have discussed and explained this bill that it will reduce the price of sugar to the consumer to the amount of the present duties about 2 cents per pound, which will save to the people on this article alone more than $100,000,000 annually. And yet the gentleman frm Illinois, the distinguished minority leader, Mr. MANN, still desires information and continues to call for more light on this measure. The sober truth is, that it is not so much light and information that the gentleman needs as it is to have the scales of prejudice removed from his understanding [applause on the Democratic side]; and that is something which no one can be expected to do for a man who believes that the special interests have vested and sacred rights to tax the people, and that one man should be taxed in order to guarantee prosperity to another.

In my opinion, the man who discovers and puts into successful operation and practical use perpetual motion will have passed from the earth more than a thousand years before the man will be born who can convince a stand-pat Republican that the tariff is a tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the information and explanations furnished do not convince him, then he could not be convinced though one rose from the dead.

When at the extra session of Congress last summer the distinguished ex-Speaker of the House, Mr. CANNON, rose in his seat and asked the minority leader to spell for him the word "innocence," that inspired the hope in my mind that both he and his followers had been taught a lesson by the chastisement administered by the American people, and that, though late in life, he desired to atone for the many wrongs committed against the American people and bring forth fruits worthy of repentance by at least allowing some measure of relief to be afforded without bitter opposition and protest. But, alas, my fairest hopes were soon dashed to the ground as I saw the stand-pat element of that party arrayed in solid phalanx and breathing out cursings and threatenings against the Democratic Party for every attempt made to keep faith with the people. Like Pharaoh of old, they continued to harden their hearts, and the sow that seemed to have been washed returned again to her wallow in the mire. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

What is now bringing the greatest distress to the Republican camp, what is wormwood and gall to its very soul, is the fact that the Democratic Party is keeping the faith by redeeming its pledges made to the American people. The national Democratic platform of 1908 declared for a gradual, not a radical, reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis; but it also declared that articles which come in competition with trust-made articles should be placed on the free list. And the Sugar Trust is one of the most diabolical, arrogant monopolies that ever preyed upon the American people. It has not only plundered and pillaged the people of many millions of dollars, but has robbed the Federal Treasury of equally large amounts by means of false weights, secret springs, etc., which is too fresh in the minds of the people to need discussion at this time.

In 1908 the Republican Party promulgated a new doctrine. It for the first time admitted in its platform that tariff taxes were too high, and pledged that, if again trusted with power, a revision would be had by special session of Congress immediately after the inauguration of the new President. Hitherto the Republican Party had always taught that the tariff was not a tax, or if a tax at all it was paid by the foreigner, and if we continued the high protective system that prosperity would be guaranteed to every line of American industry; that capital would be rewarded by liberal dividends; that labor would be employed on full time at a remunerative wage; and that we would be entirely immune from all financial disturbances, and that prosperity would abide forever. Then why did they abandon this position, which they had taken for a generation, and promise a revision of the tariff—mark you, that they ingeniously used the word revision instead of reduction. Their reason was apparent to everyone; it was born of necessity.

The guaranty which had been given by that party in all of its platforms by all of its candidates from President down to township constable, in all of its newspapers, both daily and weekly, that a continued high tariff meant prosperity had come to naught. The Roosevelt panic, which started in 1907, was in full sweep, banks were closed, factories idle, labor unemployed, and distress abroad in the land, and that at a time when the earth had brought forth abundant crops and when no unusual symptoms of financial distress were being felt in any other part of the globe. Soup houses were the only institutions which were doing a thriving business; the "full dinner pail" had disappeared from the land, and old General Prosperity, that famous old knight, had departed to the realm of the unknown. Under these embarrassing and distressing conditions the Republican Party was forced, if it should have any chance at all of success, to admit what it had always denied—that the tariff was a tax—and promise what it had no intention to perform, a reduction of high tariff taxes. The Democratic Party, still torn by internal strife and dissensions, was unable to marshal all of its fighting strength and the Republican Party was again successful and continued in control of every department of the Federal Government. Pursuant to promise, President Taft, shortly after his inauguration, convened Congress into extraordinary session and recommended a revision of the tariff. And so the dance started, all was merry, joy was unconfined; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was made Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, was in charge at the north end of the Capitol. Everyone realized that nothing more than a hollow mockery was to be expected under such leadership.

The work had progressed but a short way till the Democrats and Progressive Republicans began to protest that the schedules, as they were being made, were not reductions but rather increases. Such patriotic Republicans in the House as NORRIS, MURDOCK, WOODS, LENROOT, LINDBERGH, COOPER, and others, and at the other end of the Capitol such distinguished Republicans as Senators Dolliver, CUMMINS, LA FOLLETTE, Beveridge, and BRISTOW voted against the measure and denounced it as a violation of the platform pledges and promises and a betrayal of the American people. It was such a flagrant violation of the Republican platform that the present distinguished minority leader, Mr. MANN, refused to give it his support on the final passage. However, CANNON, Aldrich, PAYNE and company had their way, the President joyfully gave it his indorsement and bestowed upon it his blessing by calling it the "best tariff law ever enacted." During this battle in the House, while the Democrats were unable to prevent the passage of this iniquitous law, they were able, under the leadership of our present wise and distinguished Speaker, to unite themselves into a solid, compact, aggressive party.

In the first two preliminary skirmishes following the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law, in Massachusetts and New York, where special elections were held, in strong Republican districts the Republican Party was completely routed on its tariff record and Democrats were elected. In the general election of 1910 a Republican majority of 40 in the House was changed to a Democratic majority of 66; Democratic governors were elected in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Ohio, Indiana, and even in the rock-ribbed old State of Maine, where for 40 years the Democrats had wandered in the wilderness, a Democratic governor was chosen and a legislature which sent two stalwart Democrats to the United States Senate.

And to-day the Democratic Party is united as it has not been in 20 years; the Republican Party is divided, discordant, belligerent, rent with family feuds, and soiled with fraternal blood, and even President Taft is having to fight with desperation and resort to all the tactics of a ward politician for an indorsement and renomination, which he is by no means certain to receive. His predecessor in office, the man who brought about his nomination and election, is declaring that the President has not kept faith; yet their party will perhaps be forced to give him the nomination, well knowing that if the Democrats still continue to stand together during the remainder of this session of Congress and to fulfill their pledges and keep faith with the people, that he can no more be elected than the law of gravitation can be suspended.

But while President Taft has signally failed as the great heralded reformer, he has more than made good as an agitator, and will go down in history as the greatest agitator ever elected to the exalted position of the Presidency. Our political enemies have often taunted us with the charge that we do too much agitating and that the business interests of the country have been greatly damaged by too much agitation; but what can they say now when it is an undeniable fact that from the time of his inauguration down to the present our distinguished President has kept up a continuous agitation of the tariff question; first, by calling the Sixty-first Congress into extra session immediately after his inauguration and agitating the tariff; then, by numerous speeches throughout the country after the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law, trying to placate the people, but finding that the damage was too great and the people too indignant and sore he subsequently admitted that the Payne-Aldrich Act was not a full compliance with the Republican platform, and admitted in the most significant way possible the failure and untrustworthiness of his own party by convening the Sixty-second Congress into extraordinary session and again agitating the question of tariff taxation, as he had done throughout the whole of the Sixty-first Congress, admitting, as no other President had ever done, that his party, after having been in unbroken power for 14 years, had been so derelict in duty that he was forced to renew the agitation by calling the Sixty-second Congress together and appealing to the Democrats for help.

If confession is the strongest possible testimony as to guilt, then what more need be added in this case. Furthermore, at the close of the extra session of the present Congress, after having vetoed the measures of reform passed by the people's representatives, he again served notice on Congress that he would continue to agitate the tariff question again at this present session, which he has faithfully done, knowing at the same time that he would again veto all measures of reform which the people's representatives might enact. When the Republican Party again goes before the people in the approaching campaign with this famous agitator as its candidate, or, perchance, with the apostle of new nationalism, which can mean anything or nothing, to suit the fancy of its author, the man who was such a great terror to the lions of Africa, but at whose feet the lion of monopoly could always sleep with the feeling of utmost security, I say with either of these candidates, representing as they do diametrically opposing views, each denouncing the policies and views of the other, and with its record of extravagance, of broken promises, and unfulfilled pledges, the verdict of the American people will doubtless be, "Depart, ye workers of political injustice and iniquity, we regret that we ever knew you."

On the other hand, the Democratic Party will go before the people—it may be with the distinguished governor of Ohio, who swept that Republican State into the Democratic ranks with a majority of over 100,000; or with the great educational governor of New Jersey, who was elected by an overwhelming majority in that hitherto strongly Republican State; or, perhaps, with one of our dearly beloved sons of this House, with whose public services the country is so well pleased, our distinguished Speaker or the majority floor leader, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee—and with either of these men as our nominee, with a record of fidelity to the people, political promises redeemed, and pledges faithfully kept, standing for economy and justice, a fair race in life for every man, and for equal opportunities for all and special advantages to none, the people will respond by saying, "Well done, good and faithful servants, ye have been faithful over a few things, ye shall be made ruler over many things." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me I wish to speak upon the purpose of this bill, its effect, and why I shall oppose it.

The purpose of this bill is to reduce the cost of sugar. I can not look at it as a reasonable business proposition that the cost of an article will be reduced when the production is curtailed or when the manufacturing industry is destroyed. If the price of sugar is to be reduced, how or where is it to be lowered? If this industry is to be destroyed in the United States, which seems to be almost admitted here, where are we to look for the establishment of the price of sugar? Is it to be in Europe, where the Brussels convention seems to be a monopoly and has full power to direct and control the price and the output of sugar? Do you expect to get your supply from Europe under such an arrangement as they have in Europe now for the output of their sugar? Can a man rise on the floor of this House and say that we are not now getting our sugar cheaper than any country in Europe save England? And if sugar can be sold in other countries for more than it sells for in this country, how do you expect to import from Europe?

During the six weeks of taking testimony and the great agitation upon the subject of the tariff on sugar in this country, I have received but one letter, out of a constituency of more than 200,000, asking me to vote for free sugar, and one letter stating that the writer was opposed to free sugar.

From the minority report of the Ways and Means Committee I find that during the calendar year of 1897—the first calendar year after the passage of the Dingley bill—the amount of sugar consumed in the United States was 2,002,902 long tons. Of this amount 1,483,544 long tons, or 74.1 per cent, paid full duty. During the calendar year 1910 the total consumption of sugar in the United States was 3,350,355 tons, of which amount 72,393 long tons, or 2.1 per cent, paid full duty; and that of the total consumption of sugar in the United States during the calendar year 1910, 2.1 per cent paid full duty, 48.9 per cent paid 80 per cent of the full duty, and the balance, or 49 per cent, paid no duty.

I leave it to any gentleman, as a fair business proposition, whether this magnificent industry ought to be destroyed. I have never been more charmed with the conditions of my country than when I have heard Member after Member rise upon this floor and tell of the development of the production of sugar in this country. Every other nation has aided and protected and built up its sugar industry. The effort now is to wipe it out in this country and to close the factories. A few years ago we had the furnaces put out by the Wilson bill, and now you are going to put out the fires in this magnificent industry by one fell swoop. Who then will fix the price of sugar in America if the beet-sugar industry is destroyed? It will be the Sugar Trust. What has been our experience with the Sugar Trust in the last few years? They have paid in judgments and fines to the Government more than $4,000,000 as penalties for their chicanery, and now we are asked to destroy the industry that is the only competitor of the trust. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, it has been said here that the greatest authority, not only in the United States but in the world, upon the sugar industry is Mr. Willett, of the firm of Willett & Gray, of New York. What does he say? He says that when the sugar of the sugar-beet industry comes upon the market the price of sugar immediately falls. I quote from the hearings this testimony of Mr. Willett:

Mr. WILLETT. There is no question whatever, Mr. Chairman, that the coming onto the market in October of the Michigan sugars and other domestic sugars dropped the price from 6.57 in October down to 6.11 in November, and December 5.63.

Will not the price of sugar, then, immediately rise if we destroy the competition? Is it not a plain business proposition to any man here, and will he not say, that we should not destroy this industry which regulates and keeps down the price of sugar, a necessary article of food for every man, woman, and child in the country? We should not turn the sugar-beet industry over to other countries and then pay to those foreign countries between fifty and sixty millions of dollars a year for sugar that we could have produced here. That is no small item. We need to support this Government. We are sent here to vote and to legislate for a great Nation. Is it our duty to cripple and weaken the industries of the country and to receive no benefit thereby? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of this sugar bill because it puts sugar upon the free list. No other civilized nation has sugar on the free list. I am opposed to putting sugar on the free list because it will not only prejudice but utterly destroy one of the most valuable industries of the American farmer and the American people. I am opposed to the passage of the bill because it is against the principles of the Republican Party, which elected me to Congress. I am opposed to the passage of the bill because it is in violation of the principles of the Republican national platform. I am opposed to the bill because, if anything is proven by the hearings and testimony taken by the committee upon the sugar schedule, it is that we can not produce sugar as cheaply in the United States as they can in foreign countries; that the cost of labor there is only one-third what it is in this country. It could not be established more strongly by the testimony, which to me is quite equivalent to an admitted fact, that the free importation of sugar would destroy the industry in this country. The beet-sugar industry in the United States, although scarcely two decades old, has proven one of the most beneficial, prosperous, and satisfactory of all our industries. This bill would deprive our Treasury of $52,000,000 revenue annually and turn our valuable market over to foreign countries.

I was not elected upon a free-trade platform. I was not elected to destroy or cripple the industries of the United States. I was not elected to legislate for the industries or peoples of foreign countries. I was not elected to aid the trusts or build up monopolies. I voted against the Canadian reciprocity treaty because it discriminated against the American farmer and was not a measure that came within the tenets of the party I represent.

The passage of this bill will not only jeopardize but will destroy the sugar-beet industry of the United States. This industry has grown to one of large magnitude in recent years and is the only competitor of the sugar refineries and Sugar Trust in our Republic. If it had not been for the beet-sugar industry, the arbitrary rise in the price of sugar in the fall of 1911 undoubtedly would have continued through the whole season.

It was demonstrated by the testimony taken at the hearings of the committee that the price of sugar established by the American sugar-refining companies—the so-called Sugar Trust—dropped almost immediately after the beet-sugar factories put beet sugar upon the market. The sugar industry is of the utmost importance to our national prosperity. It furnishes a market for one of the most remunerative crops raised by the farmers of the North, of the East, and of the West, as well as to the cane growers of the South.

If the sugar-beet industry of the United States is destroyed, we have only to look to the great sugar refiners for our supply. They then would fix the price—we import no sugar of consequence from Europe. The price of sugar is higher in every country in Europe except England, where it is only a fraction of a cent less, than the price in the United States. The world's price of sugar is not fixed by competition, but by manipulation by the Brussels convention in Europe and by the Sugar Trust in the United States. It would be a good business policy for us to keep at home the millions of dollars paid by us annually to foreign countries for sugar.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of such a reduction of the tariff on sugar as will equalize the difference in the cost of production in this country and in foreign countries, so that our American farmers and laboring men will be protected against the cheap labor of other sugar-producing countries. I am in favor of a Tariff Board or Tariff Commission and a scientific revision of all our tariff laws based upon the report of such a nonpartisan scientific board of experts appointed to investigate the cost of production in this country and in foreign countries. The people are in full accord with this or a similar commission, and to abolish the same would meet with their disapproval.

The Ways and Means Committee have reported that it costs 3.54 cents per pound to manufacture beet sugar in the United States and 2.415 cents per pound in Germany. It costs practically the same to manufacture cane as beet sugar in the United States. This shows that it costs 1.125 cents per pound less to produce sugar in Germany than in the United States, and in the absence of the report of the Tariff Commission I would favor a reduction of the tariff on sugar to meet this difference.

The people of the United States consumed 7,663,000,000 pounds of sugar in the year 1911, equivalent to 3,821,000 short tons. Of this vast amount sugar beets produced 550,000 tons from 35,000,000 tons of sugar beets raised by the American farmers. Sugar beets are grown in 16 different States of the Union. There were in operation 71 beet-sugar factories in the year 1911, and at the present time there are many new factories awaiting the action of Congress on this schedule. The factories are located as follows:

California	10
Colorado	17
Idaho	4
Illinois	1
Kansas	1
Michigan	17
Minnesota	1
Montana	1
Nebraska	2
Nevada	1
Ohio	3
Oregon	1
Utah	6
Iowa	1
Wisconsin	4

The following is a practical estimate of the condition of the sugar-beet industry in the United States in the year 1910–11:

Number of acres of sugar beets raised	400,000
Amount paid to American farmers for sugar beets	$21,000,000
Amount invested in various factories in the United States	$100,000,000
Amount paid for labor in the growing of beets and the manufacture of the sugar	$23,000,000
Tons of sugar consumed in the United States	3,500,000
Tons of beet sugar grown and manufactured in the United States	550,000
Tons of cane sugar from Texas and Louisiana	350,000
Tons of sugar imported from our colonial possessions, duty free	1,000,000
Short tons imported from Cuba	1,600,000

This magnificent industry has grown up in recent years, receiving its first real impetus from the Dingley tariff law of 1897.

In Michigan raising sugar beets is an industry especially valuable to the farmer. In the year 1911 there were grown in Michigan 152,000 acres of sugar beets, which produced about 140,000 tons of sugar. There was paid out to the Michigan farmers last year for sugar beets the sum of $8,000,000. The capital invested in factories in Michigan alone is approximately $17,000,000, and there was paid out for labor to operate the factories more than $2,000,000. The destruction of the sugar-beet industry will be a great injury to Michigan and the Michigan farmers and prove costly to the consuming public. The sugar-beet industry in Michigan reaches out and affects other allied business, and in its production consumed last year 250,000 tons of Michigan coal, 100,000 tons of Michigan limestone, and 420,000 barrels made by Michigan workmen. All this in addition to the benefits accruing to the farmers engaged in raising beets and the workmen employed at good wages in Michigan sugar factories.

The effective tariff is that levied on Cuban sugar, and is $1.34 to the hundred pounds. The United States is not the only country that charges a tariff upon imported sugar. The tariff charged is for the double purpose of raising revenue and encouraging and protecting the home industry in the production of beet sugar, except in the case of England, which produces no sugar and has a tariff purely for revenue. The following table shows the duty charged in the different countries per hundred pounds:

England	$0.40
Germany	2.00
France	2.19
Russia	5.50
Austria-Hungary	3.99
United States duty on Cuban sugar	1.34

So it is readily seen that the United States by imposing a duty upon imported sugar is only following the custom of the principal sugar-producing countries of the world in protecting its sugar industry and raising revenue.

The effect of putting sugar on the free list in the United States would be to destroy the sugar-beet industry and turn that industry over to the uncertainty of conditions in foreign countries and the Sugar Refining Trust of the United States. The farmers and sugar-beet growers are actual producers of property and wealth. The refiners are not. They only change the condition of raw sugar into its refined state.

Senator BRISTOW, of Kansas, during the course of debate in regard to free raw sugar had this to say in the Senate:

> The only competitors of any consequence that the American refiners have in this country are the American beet-sugar producers, and free raw sugar from the West Indies would, as the Senator from Utah knows, destroy the beet-sugar industry in the United States and thereby destroy the only competitor that the American sugar refiner has. If he can have free raw sugar, so that he could get it from the West Indies without paying any duty, it would then cost him $1.34 a hundred less than it does now. Having a monopoly of the refining business in the United States, he would be able to crush the beet-sugar industry in this country. Therefore he is now engaged in a propaganda to induce the American Congress to repeal all sugar duties.

And the gentleman from Nebraska, Judge NORRIS, in opening his remarks in the House to-day on the sugar schedule, said:

> Mr. Chairman, I think it will be admitted by all candid-thinking men that if the bill is passed without amendment the result will be that all the beet-sugar factories in the United States will have to suspend operation and go out of business.

Mr. Chairman, the price of sugar has steadily fallen in this country during the last 40 years, and I believe, if our sugar industry is properly protected by a reasonable import duty that it will fall still lower, as the farmer and the manufacturer become more efficient in growing the crops and manufacturing the sugar. In 1870 we were paying 13.51 cents per pound wholesale for our sugar; in 1880 we paid 9.8 cents; in 1890, 6.27 cents; in 1900, 5.32 cents; and in 1909 it had fallen to 4.76 cents per pound wholesale. At the present time it is around 5.5 cents.

Taking the tariff off hides did not reduce the price of harness, shoes, or leather goods to the consumer, and taking the tariff off sugar will not permanently reduce the price, because the price is not now fixed by competition, but in Europe is controlled by the Brussels convention and in America by the Sugar Trust, based upon European quotations, except where the American sugar refiners are brought in competition with the domestic product.

The following table, taken from the majority report of the Ways and Means Committee, shows the growth of the industry in the United States and the production and imports from 1879 to 1909, inclusive:

Production, imports, exports, and consumption of sugar in continental United States for selected years: 1879 to 1909.

All the sugar we consume could be grown and produced from sugar beets raised by the American farmer. The Secretary of Agriculture officially states—Senate Document No. 22, Sixty-first Congress, first session, page 28—that there are 274,000,000 acres of sugar-beet land in the United States, and that if 1 acre in 50 suitable for beet culture were put out to sugar beets it would supply all the sugar used in the United States in any one year, and that in some parts of the United States the soil and climatic conditions possess material advantages over those of Europe.

The reason the United States can not compete with foreign countries in the production of sugar is that our farmers are paid more for their beets and our laborers are paid more for their work.

Germany in the last three years produced an average of 2,082,000 tons of sugar each year on 1,107,000 acres of land. This is nearly two-thirds of the sugar consumed annually in the United States. In the United States we have 274,000,000 acres of land suitable for beet culture, so there is no question but that we have a sufficient area to supply the United States many times over if a small part of the sugar area were planted with beets and we had the sugar factories and sugar-factory capacity to do the manufacturing.

Before the Ways and Means Committee in 1909 Mr. W. H. Baird, who had made an inspection of the American and European factories for that purpose, testified as to the wages paid in the different countries. I incorporate his statement as to the wages paid in this country and in foreign countries.

Just how the American beet-sugar companies can produce sugar as cheaply as it is produced in foreign countries while paying so much more for their beets and higher wages to their workmen, is not quite so apparent; but, as in the case of tin plate, pearl buttons, steel rails, picture cards, and other manufactured articles, if given an opportunity and a reasonable protection, there can be no question but that, with our superior machinery and the permanent investment of American capital and the application of American skill and workmanship, in another decade or two, at the furthest, we will produce in the United States all the sugar we consume, and the price will be reduced and kept down by fair competition.

The report of the committee seems to have given great importance to the testimony of Mr. Claus A. Spreckels, who is the president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., and who testified before the committee that beet-sugar factories located in proper localities, such as Colorado, California, Utah, Idaho, and Oregon, should and, he was informed, did produce granulated sugar at 2.5 cents per pound.

The committee reports that the average cost of producing beet sugar in 11 plants in the United States is shown to be 3.54 cents per pound. This is a fair average of the cost of producing a pound of beet sugar. Of this amount there is paid to the farmer 2.4 cents per pound for the sugar in the beets before refining and to the manufacturer 1.14 cents per pound for manufacturing the beets into sugar.

The beet-sugar factories pay $6 per ton for beets that produce 250 pounds of sugar to the ton. This is 2.4 cents a pound to the farmer for the sugar in his beets, and allows 1.14 cents for manufacturing, providing the total cost is 3.54 cents per pound.

In the committee hearings it was shown that the cost of producing beet sugar for the season of 1910–11 for each of the following companies was as follows:

	Per 100 pounds.
Michigan Sugar Co	$3.48
Great Western Sugar Co	3.43
Billings Sugar Co	3.49
Scott's Bluff Sugar Co	3.85
Amalgamated Sugar Co	3.05
Lewiston Sugar Co	3.03
Utah-Idaho Sugar Co	3.53
Alameda Sugar Co	4.32
Spreckels Sugar Co	2.70
Menominee Sugar Co	4.39
Continental Sugar Co	4.08
Iowa Sugar Co	5.14
Carver County Sugar Co	3.75

These are the figures for the year 1910–11, and they do not cover the items of selling expense, including brokerage, discount, insurance, and storage, nor do they include any charge for plant depreciation or interest on the investment.

The price of sugar is shown by the following table taken from the majority report of the committee, and shows that even in the United States, with a tariff, the price of sugar is lower than in any of the principal countries of Europe except England, which does not produce sugar, but levies a duty of 40 cents per hundredweight for revenue.

Average quotations, net cash, in cents per pound, in 1910.

Another table which I wish to incorporate in my remarks is taken from the same committee report, and is a comparison of the export price of sugar at Hamburg and the wholesale price of the same at New York, from 1900 to 1911, inclusive:

1911	2.82	4.45	1.63	3.20	5.34	2.14

I call attention to the fact that this table gives the market price, but not what the refiners paid for their sugar during 1911 or what was the occasion of the sharp rise in the price during the fall of that year.

I have received from the Bureau of Statistics a statement showing the imports of sugar into the United States from Cuba and the Philippines and the domestic shipments of sugar to the United States from Hawaii and Porto Rico during the calendar years 1909, 1910, and 1911. The statement proves conclusively that there was no shortage in the sugar crop to warrant the arbitrary rise in prices last fall, and is as follows:

	1909	1910	1911
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.
Cuba	3,250,337,047	3,673,173,609	3,192,697,996
Philippine Islands	108,498,523	217,771,700	401,748,936
Hawaii:
Unrefined sugar	1,032,082,985	981,143,651	1,106,409,289
Refined sugar	33,927,400	27,575,800	29,305,650
Porto Rico	502,568,682	625,982,342	653,819,757

The question arises as to how much the refiners paid last year for their raw material, all of which was imported from our insular possessions and Cuba except 200,000 tons imported from foreign countries. The shortage was not sufficient to warrant a rise in price of 2 to 3 cents a pound. If it be claimed that the tariff was the cause of the increase in the price of sugar, it no place appears that the refineries paid more for their raw sugar during the year 1911 than during previous years. It seems that the increase in the price of the sugar during the year 1911 was an arbitrary raise on the part of the sugar refineries and that the price was reduced only when the beet-sugar companies put their sugar upon the market, in October, 1911. If the beet-sugar manufacturers were able to reduce the price in the year 1911, they can do so any other year, and in this will greatly benefit the consumer.

How much the beet-sugar companies of the country reduce the prices of the refiners is not known, but if it had not been for the beet-sugar companies the consuming public undoubtedly would have had to pay an increased price of at least 2 cents per pound indefinitely. This was a direct saving to the public of more than the whole tariff duty and an object lesson to the Sugar Trust. It is estimated that the consumption of sugar in the United States amounts to 70,000 barrels of sugar a day. A barrel of sugar weighs 350 pounds, and an increase of 2 cents a pound, or $7 a barrel, would amount to $490,000 a day. The unjust, arbitrary, and unwarranted advance in the price of sugar last fall shows the avariciousness of the trust and its disregard of fair dealing.

The reason given for the increase in the price of sugar last fall was the shortage of the crop in Europe on account of the drought. This argument loses weight when it is known that we imported practically no sugar from Europe during the year 1911 and that we found a full supply for our needs in the United States and from our insular possessions and Cuba. If the mere rumor of a shortage of crop in Europe is sufficient to increase the price abnormally 2 to 3 cents a pound, it can readily be seen how sensitive the sugar market is to mere rumors, and in no instance can the sugar business of this country become stable when the price is subjected to fluctuation from mere talk. What will be the rumor next year? Will it be floods or drought? We ought not to subject this important industry to the mere caprice of foreign conditions, but it should be established on a firm basis, an American policy, a permanent condition, and, above all, we should manufacture our own sugar and assert our own independence in that regard.

That the refiners will take advantage of every condition to benefit themselves, with small thought as to the welfare of the country or the rights of the public, is abundantly proven by a reading of the history of the proceedings had against them in our courts in recent years. And even now the Government is pushing its prosecution of them for illegal practices, notwithstanding that these same sugar refiners have been repeatedly convicted of defrauding the Government, by short weights and otherwise, and have paid vast sums into the Treasury of the United States as penalties for their misdeeds and sharp practices.

In New York alone the sugar companies have been made to disgorge the following amounts from their store of ill-gotten gains:

American Sugar Refining Co.:
March, 1909, judgment for penalties	$135,486.32
April, 1909, settlement of other penalties and duties	2,000,000.00
Jan. 30, 1911, amount collected for drawbacks fraudulently withheld	700,000.00
Arbuckle Bros.:
Dec. 4, 1909, duties and penalties	695,573.19
National Sugar Refining Co.:
Feb. 19, 1910, duties and penalties	604,204.37

And will it be claimed that the consuming public will receive just treatment, fair prices, or a square deal at the hands of these great sugar-refining companies if all competition is destroyed and our American beet-sugar industry put out of business?

From a business standpoint there is every reason why we should give support to and encourage the beet-sugar industry in the United States. We have in this country favorable conditions for sugar-beet culture, and by American ingenuity and the efficiency of our more intelligent laborers we ought to overcome the handicap of lower wages in foreign countries in due time.

It has been testified to by a number of expert witnesses at the hearings of the committee that removing the tariff on sugar would destroy the beet-sugar industry of the United States. If this is correct, and we are to rely on or believe such testimony, is it possible that any Member of this body believes that the consumers of sugar in this country would get a square deal from the Sugar Trust in the matter of prices when all competition from the beet-sugar companies had been swept away? Judging the future by the past, we have no ground for such a faith.

Mr. Chairman, I am loath to think that there are any who would be in favor of the destruction of this industry for the benefit of the Sugar Trust, and I submit from the testimony that such would be the effect.

Mr. Willett testified during the hearings:

We had a very present example—that the moment our American beet-sugar production became available on the market the rise stopped, and, owing entire and totally to this American production, refined sugars were a cent and a half lower than they were at the highest point. But for that American production we to-day would be buying sugar at the world's prices. We can not get rid of it. There is no other source from which we could get sugar.

Mr. SULZER. And another way to get cheaper sugar for the people of the United States would be to encourage the production of beet and cane sugar in the United States and in our insular possessions?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

Now, let us see who it is that wants the duty taken off raw sugar. According to the hearings before the committee the gentlemen who were the most insistent that this action be taken were the following philanthropists and benefactors of the poor: Claus A. Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co.; Charles Heike, secretary of the American Sugar Refining Co. from 1887 to 1910; William G. Gilmore, a partner of Arbuckle Bros., sugar refiners; James H. Post, president of the National Sugar Refining Co.; William A. Jameson, another partner of Arbuckle Bros., sugar refiners; Edwin F. Atkins, vice president and acting president of the American Sugar Refining Co.

And Mr. Heike testified that if the duty were removed on sugar we could produce neither cane nor beet sugar in this country, the following being his reply to an inquiry of Congressman FORDNEY:

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar could we produce either cane or beets in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then that would destroy the industry absolutely in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to incorporate in my remarks a little testimony at first hand from some of the farmers of my own State in regard to the great benefit to the soil of raising sugar beets, and also a statement showing the cost per acre of raising and marketing the crop:

I wish to say that I have grown sugar beets for the last three years and I can truthfully say that the growing of sugar beets is a benefit to the soil if the crop is given proper rotation. I have received the best results by following the crop with a crop of oats. This season (1909) I thrashed from 5 acres of measured ground, which was in sugar beets last season, 270 bushels of oats, or an average of 54 bushels per acre. The balance of my oat crop which was on ground following a corn crop (equally as good soil) is yielding about 40 bushels per acre. Therefore I feel that I am justified in making this statement. (Alex. Larkins, Carleton.)

I have raised beets for the last seven years and have averaged about 16 tons per acre. I also find that oats will do better on the ground where I raise beets than they will on other ground. This year the oats on my beet ground produced 75 bushels per acre, while the others only produced about 60 bushels per acre. (Sam Seizert, Blissfield.)

In regard to beet culture, I wish to say that I have raised sugar beets for six years and consider it one of the most profitable crops that a farmer can raise. Not only because he gets the greater return for his labor, when they are properly cared for, but because the ground is left in the best possible condition for the next crop, for since raising sugar beets my land has been gradually increasing her yield per acre. The increase in yield of oats has been from 15 to 25 per cent, or from 40 or 45 to 55 bushels per acre, and on wheat the increase has been about the same. When I have raised beets two consecutive years on the same piece of ground and then sowed oats they were extra. We as farmers are satisfied that we get better crops since raising beets. (S. S. Teed, Middleton.)

In regard to the condition of ground that beets have been grown on, will say that I have grown beets quite extensively and find that it is an improvement rather than a detriment to the soil. In 1901 I grew 2 acres of beets; went about 18 tons per acre; followed with beets, besides adding 20 acres, making 31 acres for 1902, average yield, about 11½ tons. Out of 31 acres, 17 acres to beans following, yielding 14 bushels per acre. Same 12 acres to wheat, yielding 37 bushels per acre, following with the biggest crop of hay ever cut in the neighborhood, and 5 acres of 17-acre bean ground went to oats the following spring, yielding 53 bushels besides one-third loss on account of being lodged, average for year in neighborhood being about 27 bushels. In 1904 had 2½ acres of beets, yielding about 9 tons, following with oats yielding 45 bushels per acre; average in neighborhood, about 30 bushels per acre. In 1905 had 40 acres of beets, 8 tons; following 8 acres to beets again, yielding about 10 tons second year; following next with oats yielding 51 bushels per acre. Balance of 40 acres, 12 acres went to beans; balance of 20 acres were sown to oats, yielding about 47 bushels per acre; following same with wheat, yielding about 28 bushels, when average in neighborhood was about 13 bushels. In 1906 had 14 acres to beets, about 10 tons yield, following same with 14 acres to oats, yielding about 47 bushels per acre; then to wheat, yielding 28 bushels per acre; average for wheat that year in neighborhood about 13 bushels per acre. In 1907 had 17 acres in beets, average about 11 tons. Of 17 acres 3 acres went to oats, and seeded 6 acres to beets again, yielding about the same, and balance of 17 acres, or 8 acres, went to oats, yielding 68 bushels per acre; then to wheat, yielding this year 38 bushels per acre, and good seeding in sight. In 1908 had 15 acres of beets, about 10 tons average yield; 12 acres now to oats with a prospect for a bumper crop, and balance of 15 acres, or 3 acres, are to beets again this year. This year have 26 acres to beets with good prospect for 11 or 12 tons. This report was made and kept on one of my "eighties." On the other have grown in the last four seasons, including 13 acres this year, 71 acres, with about the same results in regard to following crops, although have no record of different fields and yield. (W. J. Davis, Sunfield.)

It gives me great pleasure in having a chance to show to my brother farmers the little I know about sugar beets placing the soil in a better chemical condition for other grain crops than any other crop in the rotation. On a 6-acre lot of beets I harvested 11 tons per acre of beets. I followed the beets with barley and got 50 bushels per acre, an increase of 50 per cent as compared with crops raised by my neighbors and myself formerly. The above 6 acres was put to wheat after the barley and made 35 bushels per acre, and the stand of clover is good for sore eyes. I am more than satisfied with the beets, not alone for the money crop, but also the permanent good to the land. (W. L. Huber, Charlotte.)

The following shows the average cost of raising an acre of sugar beets and marketing the crop, and shows that a large part of the expense is labor. And I submit that it is better for our domestic prosperity that this money should be earned and spent in this country than that we should turn to foreign lands for our sugar:

Fall plowing	$1.50
Harrowing, disking, and planking	2.00
Seed, 20 pounds, at 10 cents per pound	2.00
Drilling the seed	.75
Hand labor, which consists of blocking and thinning, weeding twice, pulling, and cutting off the tops	20.00
Six horse cultivations	3.00
Hauling (varies with the tonnage and distance to the factory or beet dump)	6.00
Rent	5.00
Incidentals, including depreciation of machinery and interest on the investment	1.00
Fertilizer, 125 pounds	1.75

Mr. Chairman, this is a contest between the beet and cane growers of the United States on the one side, and the sugar refiners on the other. For me I cast my lot with the producers, believing that by removing the tariff there will be a great American industry ruined and no permanent, substantial reduction in the price of sugar to the ultimate consumer. Europe is the great sugar-producing country of the world. It has built up its sugar industry by tariffs and bounties. The price of sugar in Europe is controlled by the Brussels convention, and the proceedings in the United States courts against the sugar refineries in our own country are based upon the fact that they are a trust. The industry outside of America and its possessions is guided and directed by a combined agreement which limits the output in Russia, which stifles competition in England, and manipulates the trade of the great countries of Germany, France, Austria, and Holland.

I ask every Member of this great law-making body to protect by his vote this American industry in the interest of the producer, the consumer, and the country as a whole.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think I can understand, if I can not sympathize with, the desire of gentlemen to rush this legislation through this House with just as little noise as possible. I have no doubt they would like to deliver this measure out of this body as silently and expeditiously as it was conceived in the committee and ratified in the caucus, and that, I think, Mr. Chairman, was a record in such legislation, considering the fact that this measure involved the certain wiping out of between fifty and sixty millions of dollars of revenue and the certain crippling and possible wiping out of a great American industry. Confronted with a situation such as that, I think that any time for the consideration of this bill would be too much time for those gentlemen who favor it. But perhaps I ought not to be too severe in my observations about the manner of enacting such important legislation, because I am perfectly well aware of the fact, notwithstanding what the vote on this bill will be, that there are many gentlemen on this side of the House whose position with reference to this legislation differs from mine only by reason of the fact that I am knocking it publicly as well as privately. I know full well, Mr. Chairman, that they are just as relieved as I am by the knowledge that it will soon be on its way, destined neither to reach its destination nor to return to its origin.

Mr. Chairman, while five minutes may be ample time for gentlemen who have anything to say in favor of this bill [laughter], it is very little time indeed for a man who has many things to say against it. I can not consume the balance of my few precious minutes in general observations, but I want gentlemen here present who listened to the opening statement of the majority leader on yesterday to take their CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS and turn to page 3442 and follow what I have to say. The following colloquy appears near the bottom of the second column on that page:

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to interrupt the gentleman from Alabama, but I am very anxious to ask him a question on the point that he is just making. I am not sure that the figures which I have are correct, I am not authority for them, but I have been informed that for the 4 years during the operation of the McKinley bill, under free sugar, the average wholesale price of sugar in New York City was $4.84 per hundred, and that during the 16 years since that time, excluding last year, the price ranged about $4.60 per hundred; in other words, the average price for the 4 years under the McKinley bill, the wholesale price, ranged slightly higher than it did during the 14 years succeeding, under the Dingley law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken. Here are the figures:

Average American prices of raw and refined sugars before and after formation of the trust (terms net cash).

[1] Decrease in European crop supply of 1,000,000 tons.
[2] Increase in European crop supply of 2,000,000 tons.
[3] Short crop in Cuba.
[4] Short crop in Europe.

Mr. Chairman, the figures were not available to me at that time, but they have been put into the RECORD since, and I have analyzed them and I have done some adding and dividing, and I find, according to the gentleman's own figures, this result: That while during the four years of free sugar under the McKinley bill the average wholesale price of sugar in New York was $4.50 per hundred pounds, during the 16 succeeding years, under a duty of $1.95 per hundred on refined sugar, the average wholesale price was only $4.77½. What does that mean? It means that under a duty of $1.95 per hundred pounds the wholesale price advanced only 27½ cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. Chairman, if there has been any one statement vociferated on this floor since this debate began yesterday noon, it is the proposition that upon sugar, above all other things, was it demonstrated that the tariff was an exact addition to or an exact subtraction from the price of the article; that just as the tariff went down the price of sugar went down, and just as the tariff went up the price of sugar went up.

But that is not all. Mr. UNDERWOOD's table shows, in the footnotes, a shortage of 1,000,000 tons in the European sugar crop in 1905, a short crop in Cuba in 1908, and a short crop in Europe in 1910; and these notations are given to explain the increase in prices for those three years, which, of course, increased the average of prices for the 16 years under the Dingley law.

Assuming that with normal crops the price of sugar in each of these three years would have remained the same as in the preceding year, and deducting accordingly, we find the wholesale price of sugar for the 16-year period averages $4.71, an increase over the free-sugar period of only 21 cents per 100 pounds.

There can be no doubt the tariff duty adds to the price of sugar in this country, but that it adds the full duty, or half the duty, is clearly refuted by the table of prices furnished by the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

THE SPRECKELS CANE-SUGAR REFINERIES CARRIED ON THE FREE-SUGAR PROPAGANDA.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am opposed to the pending free-sugar bill for several substantial reasons:

First. I am not a free trader, and the pending measure affords neither protection nor revenue, but is a free-trade measure pure and simple.

Second. I pledged myself to my constituents and was pledged by my party State platform against free trade in sugar, which will seriously injure, if not destroy, our beet-sugar industry.

Third. This bill is in clear violation of the last Democratic national platform, which declared for material reductions in the tariff on the necessaries of life and for free trade only upon wood pulp, print paper, lumber, timber, and logs.

If you say that sugar is a trustized product and ought to go upon the free list, then I reply that you are discriminating against this industry when you leave upon manufactures of steel rates of duty which you admit are just as prohibitive as the existing rates and in addition give the Steel Trust free iron ore and a 50 per cent reduction on pig iron, thereby actually increasing its margin of profit.

The steel industry is trustized; it is shown by the reports of the Stanley steel committee and the Hardwick sugar committee to be much worse trustized than sugar; therefore put steel on the free list. The woolen and cotton manufacturing industries are trustized, therefore put manufactures of wool and cotton on the free list. Be consistent or be silent.

Fourth. The propaganda for free sugar was instigated by the Sugar Trust, whose principal refiners have appeared before the Hardwick sugar committee and advocated free sugar, and this propaganda has been carried on by the wholesale patrons of the Sugar Trust in the United States. I shall insert in my remarks an editorial from the New York American approving this bill, for the reason, among other things, that the Sugar Trust has heretofore written the sugar schedules, both Republican and Democratic, under Cleveland as well as McKinley; and I shall place in juxtaposition the testimony of the Sugar Trust refiners, including its criminally convicted secretary, before the Hardwick committee, advocating at this time free sugar, as well as the testimony before that committee showing the persistent and consistent efforts of the Sugar Trust, which consists of the cane-sugar refiners of the United States, to destroy or control its only competitor in this country, the beet-sugar industry.

Some gentlemen on this side profess to attach great weight to the flood of sugar petitions prepared by one F. C. Lowry, the paid agent of the Spreckels refineries, and circulated by him under the name of a fake committee of 24 wholesale grocers, who naturally expect to divide with the refiners the hog's share of the tariff.

I have here a bunch of these petitions inclosed to me in a letter from Mr. Lowry, written on his fake committee letterhead, which I shall insert in my remarks and which letter reads as follows:

COMMITTEE OF WHOLESALE GROCERS,
New York, January 5, 1912.

Hon. JOHN A. MARTIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: Constituents of yours have mailed me the inclosed petitions, duly signed, and have asked me to have same forwarded to you with the request that they be properly filed with the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

Trusting to have your valuable cooperation in the effort which we are making to secure a reduction in the present duties on raw and refined sugars, I am,

Yours, respectfully, F. C. Lowry,
Secretary.

I desire to call particular attention to a sheet of 12 of these petitions which the circulator did not even take the trouble to detach from each other and which I shall insert in my remarks just as I received it. One of the striking features of this sheet of petitions is that probably a majority of the signers can not read or write the English language. I am satisfied that Juan de Jesus Galegos can not, because Juan de Jesus has not even spelled his name right.

To the honorable the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned respectfully ask for a reduction in the duty on raw and refined sugars, in the interest both of the 80,000,000 consumers of the country and the manufacturing industries in which it is an important material. This tax amounts to 2 cents per pound on refined sugar, equivalent to an 80 per cent ad valorem duty.

This exorbitant tax is not justified by the conditions relating to the production or refining of sugar in this country. Leading sugar refiners have testified that they need no tariff protection against foreign refiners, and there is no good reason why all the people should be heavily taxed in the interest of one industry.

The relatively high price of sugar operates to prevent its more general use in the manufacture of preserved fruits of all kinds, and by adding to the cost of these articles limits their consumption. While this is the greatest fruit-growing country in the world, our exports of jams, jellies, etc., are comparatively small, as we can not compete in neutral markets with countries like Great Britain, which have the advantage of cheap sugar. A reduction of the sugar tax would greatly increase domestic consumption of these articles, and would give us a much larger share of the export trade. In many cases the canners would be enabled to buy and preserve fruits that are now wasted for lack of a market.

We believe that this is a matter which should be decided by Congress in favor of the policy which will benefit the greater number of the people, and that the interests of the consumers should receive the consideration to which they are entitled. The tax on sugar is paid wholly by the consumers, and is an unnecessary burden on one of the principal articles of their food. A reduction in this tax would, therefore, be an unquestioned advantage to the people of the entire country.

MR. LOWRY BEFORE THE HARDWICK COMMITTEE.

Frank C. Lowry, agent Federal Sugar Refining Co., secretary committee of wholesale grocers.

Mr. FORDNEY. How much money has been spent in distributing literature by that committee?

Mr. LOWRY. Somewhere in the neighborhood of $12,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Who paid that money?

Mr. LOWRY. When the committee was first formed I wrote to a number of importers—not refiners, but importers of sugar—and said that this committee would be formed, and stated its objects and solicited subscriptions from them. They had great faith in the political activities and abilities of the domestic sugar producers and said that they were in sympathy with me, but that I was pounding my head against a stone wall to try to get a reduction in the tariff; and the only one that subscribed was the Federal Sugar Refining Co.

Mr. FORDNEY. So that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. have paid in this $12,000 for the distribution of the literature?

Mr. LOWRY. Yes. (P. 1608, Hearings.)

It will be noted in the foregoing answer (see italics) that while Mr. Lowry wrote only to importers for contributions, his sole contributor was the Spreckels Co.

Mr. FORDNEY. So the committee itself has never done anything?

Mr. LOWRY. Oh, yes. The members of the committee have done a great deal of work. All of these men have been instrumental in circulating information about the tariff, and in writing to their Congressmen and Senators, and getting petitions signed. Perhaps some of you have gotten petitions asking for a reduction of the duties on sugar. They have helped very materially in that work. They have given their services, but not their money.

Mr. FORDNEY. That was all done at your request, was it not, and the literature sent out by you to them?

Mr. LOWRY. How is that question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Did not each and every member of the committee that has done any work in the way of soliciting the aid of the Members of Congress send that literature to the Members of Congress at your request, through this literature that you have sent out?

Mr. LOWRY. At my suggestion; yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. You first sent to them the literature and requested them to communicate with their Congressmen?

Mr. LOWRY. That was the nature of the work we did.

Mr. FORDNEY. That was all at the expense of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., was it? You have said that they contributed all of the money.

Mr. LOWRY. They contributed the money that enabled us to carry on that campaign.

Mr. FORDNEY. The Federal Sugar Refining Co. has paid, then, for the distribution of all this literature?

Mr. LOWRY. Yes; so far they have. (Hearings, p. 1609.)

REFINERS BEFORE THE HARDWICK COMMITTEE—BEET SUGAR A DANGEROUS COMPETITOR.

The Sugar Trust officials and allied refiners testified before the Hardwick Sugar Investigating Committee that domestic beet sugar is a strong, growing, and dangerous competitor of the cane-sugar refiners in the United States.

Copious extracts (not mere garbled quotations) of the testimony of these gentlemen before that committee are herewith given. The list comprises:

Edwin F. Atkins, vice president and acting president of the American Sugar Refining Co.; William G. Gilmore, general manager of the Arbuckle Bros.; Robert M. Parker, president of the Brooklyn Cooperage Co.; Washington B. Thomas, former president of the American Sugar Refining Co.; Claus Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co.

The companies represented by these men own and control all of the cane-sugar refineries and do all of the cane-sugar refining in the United States, and their business comprises all of the cane sugar consumed in this country.

References are to pages of the Hardwick hearings.

EDWIN F. ATKINS, VICE PRESIDENT AND ACTING PRESIDENT AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. Is the condition of the sugar business in this country, the refining business, in your judgment, such as to induce men who know about the sugar business as practical men to come back or attempt to go back into the business?

Mr. ATKINS. Not at the present time; the margin is too small. It has been very slight for the past two or three years.

Mr. HINDS. That is, the sugar business of the country is to-day in such shape that those who know about it think it ought to be held by the individuals?

Mr. ATKINS. I judge so. The competition is so sharp that people who know about the business are willing to keep out.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it really on account of the competition, Mr. Atkins? Is it not a fact that the sugar business, as held to-day, is held at a price that practical men would shrink from, considering the physical valuation of the property, and all that, would practical men wish to go in and buy it at $120 on its existing capitalization?

Mr. ATKINS. I think so. I do not think it is owing to that, but owing to the general business condition, the overproduction of refined sugar. There is very much larger capacity than is required, and the beet sugars are taking away the trade of the refiners year by year. (P. 48.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. MADISON. Is it not also true that the beet-sugar people only produce one kind of sugar—granulated sugar?

Mr. ATKINS. Exactly.

Mr. MADISON. So you can hardly ascribe it to the fierce competition by the beet-sugar people?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly. All that beet sugar comes on the market at a certain season of the year. It is all produced in about three months' time. They all want to market it just as rapidly as possible, and in order to do that they come to the eastern points. California sugar comes into Chicago, and the Michigan sugar into Buffalo and Pittsburgh and eastern refineries; not only the American Sugar Refining Co., but the others, have to reduce or close down until the beet sugars are out of the way. Any refining that is done between the 1st of October and the 1st of January is done without any profit and very often at a loss.

Mr. MADISON. Then, as a matter of fact, your competition with the beet-sugar people only exists during the few months of the year?

Mr. ATKINS. Three months, and that is 25 per cent of the whole time. (Page 49.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. MADISON. You stated a moment ago, Mr. Atkins, or this morning, that you decidedly opposed going into the beet-sugar business. What was the reason of that? Why was it that you opposed that at the time when you went to Mr. Havemeyer and called on him and said: "Now, if you are going into that business I am going to quit; I am going to sell my holdings"?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, I did. This company was organized for the purpose of refining sugars.

Mr. MADISON. Yes.

Mr. ATKINS. The beet-sugar business was a competitive business. It produced in the western territories where our market lay. That is, I say "our market"—I mean the market of the refiners, the various refiners. As that industry grew—and I foresaw that it would grow rapidly—I believed that it would reduce the volume of business, not only of the American Sugar Refining Co., but of all the refiners on the Atlantic coast; and, although we had millions of dollars invested in the business there, we were building up a competitive business, one that would compete with ourselves, and one which was bound to get away from us; we could not control it in the end. I say "we"—I had no connection whatever with it; that was simply a business man's opinion. (Pages 85–86.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. GARRETT. Do you know whether last year, at the time the beet-sugar manufactories began operations, any of the refining plants belonging to the American Sugar Refining Co. received instructions to, or did, without instructions, withdraw from the territory usually covered by the beet-sugar trade?

Mr. ATKINS. No; not through any instructions. They were forced to withdraw from the territory, owing to the cutting of prices. We could not pay duty on imported sugars and get them so far west as would enable us to sell in competition with those beet sugars. (Page 94.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. RAKER. How far west do you ship?

Mr. ATKINS. We ship, when we are able to do so, out to Omaha and Kansas City.

Mr. RAKER. You ship no farther than those points?

Mr. ATKINS. We would if we could, but we can not get in there, owing to the competition of the beet factories. If you will allow me to explain, I will tell you that the country west of the Missouri River produces an excess of sugar.

Mr. RAKER. That is not what I want now. I am trying to get the exportations from the East to the West.

Mr. ATKINS. They are very light.

Mr. RAKER. If we will just confine ourselves to that, there will not be any conflict.

Mr. ATKINS. They are very light.

Mr. RAKER. How much do you ship west of the Missouri River?

Mr. ATKINS. A very small quantity.

Mr. RAKER. Can you give me an idea in barrels?

Mr. ATKINS. I can not give you any idea at all.

Mr. RAKER. Can you furnish that before we get through?

Mr. ATKINS. We used to have a large number before beet-sugar competition. (Page 99.)

WILLIAM G. GILMORE, GENERAL MANAGER ARBUCKLE BROS.

Mr. RAKER. This beet-sugar industry and the competition between that and you is more of an imagination than it is of a reality, is it not?

Mr. GILMORE. No; I think it is an actuality.

Mr. RAKER. Can you name any concrete case or place or time when you came into actual competition; in other words, when you found the beet sugar in the same point where you were handling your cane sugar?

Mr. GILMORE. In the last two years very seriously in Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. RAKER. The beet-sugar people got in Pittsburgh, Pa.?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. From where?

Mr. GILMORE. I do not know where from. I do not know what the brand was or anything about it. I know the fact.

Mr. RAKER. What time of the year was it?

Mr. GILMORE. I know that it was so much so that a house owned by Arbuckle Bros. there was compelled to take the beet-sugar business in and buy it and sell it in competition. That is bringing coals home to Newcastle.

Mr. RAKER. Pretty close, if it is a fact.

Mr. MADISON. They did what, you say?

Mr. GILMORE. A house in Pittsburgh——

Mr. DYKMAN. Give the name of it.

Mr. GILMORE. Arbuckle & Co., a wholesale grocery house, were obliged to buy beet sugar there. This is offered in explanation of the fact——

Mr. MADISON. I just did not hear you, that is all. I beg your pardon.

Mr. RAKER. That is all right. What was the name of this firm that did this?

Mr. GILMORE. That did which?
Mr. RAKER. That had to take in the beet sugar?
Mr. GILMORE. Arbuckle & Co.
Mr. RAKER. Arbuckle & Co., located in Pittsburgh?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes.
Mr. RAKER. That was two years ago?
Mr. GILMORE. Last year and year before, I think—both.
Mr. RAKER. 1910 and 1909?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes. (Pages 1158–1159.)

ROBERT M. PARKER, PRESIDENT BROOKLYN COOPERAGE CO.

Mr. MALBY. Does the American Sugar Refining Co. at the present time ship any granulated sugar to the various States in the Mississippi Valley and in the Missouri region?
Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; a very great deal.
Mr. MALBY. And at all times of the year?
Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; until the price is so low that it is impossible to ship it at a profit.
Mr. MALBY. Who makes the prices low or creates the condition to which you refer?
Mr. PARKER. The San Francisco cane and the beet sugars from Colorado and Utah and Michigan.
Mr. MALBY. When the competition becomes sharp or gets to that point where it ceases to yield a profit, of course you cease to ship?
Mr. PARKER. Probably; yes, sir. (Pages 1463–1464.)

WASHINGTON B. THOMAS, FORMER PRESIDENT AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. MALBY. You have to-day competition among the beet-sugar industries of the United States, have you not?
Mr. THOMAS. We have.
Mr. MALBY. And good, sharp competition, say, with the Michigan Sugar Refining Co.?
Mr. THOMAS. We have.
Mr. MALBY. Notwithstanding the fact you have an interest in that company?
Mr. THOMAS. Yes; notwithstanding that fact.
Mr. MALBY. The fact is the beet sugar usually sells for about 20 cents per hundredweight below what the refined sugar sells for, does it not?
Mr. THOMAS. Cane sugar—10 to 20 per cent.
Mr. MALBY. I think the evidence is substantially 20, although sometimes 10.
Mr. THOMAS. Yes.
Mr. MALBY. During the time you were putting your sugar upon the market they were putting their sugar upon the market—I mean the beet-sugar men? The American Sugar Refining Co. scarcely ever attempts to invade their territory, do they?
Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; we go into any territory, whenever the price permits us to.
Mr. MALBY. I know; and that is just what I am inquiring about. Does the price permit you to go into Michigan territory when they are attempting to sell their sugar?
Mr. THOMAS. Only to a small extent; but they invade our territory here in the East during the same period.
Mr. MALBY. They do, because they can undersell you or sell at a price which you do not want to take. You find also competition in Colorado beet-sugar men, do you not?
Mr. THOMAS. We do.
Mr. MALBY. And those in Utah and more in California?
Mr. THOMAS. We do not reach quite as far west as that.
Mr. MALBY. Why do you not sell in California?
Mr. THOMAS. Because their prices there are such and the freight is so against us that we can not reach there.
Mr. MALBY. That is to say, they can sell sugar to the consumer cheaper than you can afford to sell?
Mr. THOMAS. We can not reach there on account of the freight. The freight is prohibitive.
Mr. MALBY. You do not sell on the Pacific slope for two reasons, probably; one is the freight rate. That is, your cost would be greater than that on the Pacific slope?
Mr. THOMAS. Yes.
Mr. MALBY. Does that same reason hold good with reference to Utah, Colorado, and Michigan?
Mr. THOMAS. I think so.
Mr. MALBY. So that, reverting to the question once more, if the beet-sugar industry was wholly destroyed, then you would get in there, would you not?
Mr. THOMAS. We would extend our sales, undoubtedly.
Mr. MALBY. Let us be frank about it. You would extend your sales to every single household where beet sugar is now sold which would pay the price, would you not?
Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; it would take the place of beet sugar.
Mr. MALBY. And the purchasers in such localities, if no refineries existed there to-day, would be obliged, from the very nature of things, to pay you such additional cost and expense as would be necessary to put your sugar into their market?
Mr. THOMAS. I would hardly say "us," meaning the American Sugar Refining Co., because they would deal with our competitors as well.
Mr. MALBY. I mean you, if you put any in there. You understand my statement, I assume? Suppose the beet-sugar interest of Utah, Colorado, and Michigan were wiped out, the territory in which you now sell but little, would the consumer not have to pay the additional price on account of their disappearing as a competitive company or factor, whether to you or somebody else, I do not care whom?
Mr. THOMAS. That would depend largely on the price of sugar throughout the world.
Mr. MALBY. I am speaking of the present situation, so we will not have any question about what is going on throughout the world.
Mr. THOMAS. Will you please repeat your question or have the stenographer read it to me?
Mr. MALBY. I ask, in case of the beet-sugar industry being wiped out in Colorado, Michigan, and Utah to-day, whether or not the consumer in the localities supplied by such beet-sugar companies would not have to pay a higher price than they do to-day?
Mr. THOMAS. I can not answer that question.
Mr. MALBY. There would be so much less sugar in the world, if they did not manufacture it, would there not?
Mr. THOMAS. Yes.
Mr. MALBY. You have very readily answered me that a diminution of a million tons did actually very greatly increase the price, although the million tons was a million tons in the world's supply. You have answered that that affected the American market?
Mr. THOMAS. Yes.
Mr. MALBY You have also answered that a 2,000,000-ton surplus greatly decreased the market, have you not?
Mr. THOMAS. Yes.
Mr. MALBY. Why have you any hesitation in saying that if the beet-sugar industry in this country were wiped out that would not have a like effect upon it?
Mr. THOMAS. I think it would have an effect to a certain extent. How much of an extent I can not tell you.
Mr. MALBY. I did not ask how much effect. I asked whether it would increase the price of sugar to the consumer, and you told me you did not know. Do you want to change that?
Mr. THOMAS. I think it possibly might increase, but to what extent I can not tell you.
Mr. MALBY. I am not asking about the extent; I know perfectly well you do not know to what extent.
Something has been said—and I think I will close with this—about the directors of your company desiring to sell certain beet-sugar stock. Is that a fact?
Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is correct.
Mr. MALBY. Are the members, likewise, who want to sell the beet-sugar stock, also in favor of a lower tariff on sugar?
Mr. THOMAS. Yes.
Mr. MALBY. They do not want to hold the beet-sugar stock if the tariff is to be lowered, in other words?
Mr. THOMAS. I think that is their position. (Pages 2013, 2014, 2015.)

CLAUS SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Spreckels, you testified this morning as to how far in the South and the West you were able to market cane sugar.
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes, sir.
Mr. HINDS. Can you tell me how far in the East the beet-sugar people are able to market their sugar?
Mr. SPRECKELS. There is the dividing line on the Missouri River. They sometimes come as far as Pittsburgh. I think the American Beet Sugar Co. has come once as far as New York City.
Mr. HINDS. Have they not come into New England, Mr. Spreckels?
Mr. SPRECKELS. They have come into the State of New York.
Mr. HINDS. Have they not also come into New England some?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I think so.
Mr. HINDS. One member of the firm of Arbuckles testified that they had come into New England.
Mr. SPRECKLES. Yes, sir.
Mr. HINDS. Are they showing a tendency to come farther east all the time?
Mr. SPRECKELS. They are.
Mr. HINDS. And make the competition severer, if it is competition?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes.
Mr. HINDS. Continually?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes, sir. They have frequently come as far as Pittsburgh. (Page 2269.)

REFINERS BEFORE THE HARDWICK COMMITTEE—FREE TRADE OR LOW DUTIES AS A "REMEDY" FOR BEET-SUGAR COMPETITION.

The Sugar Trust officials and allied refiners advocated free sugar before the Hardwick sugar investigating committee and advocated it as a means of crippling or destroying their domestic beet-sugar competitor.

Copious extracts (not mere garbled quotations) of the testimony of these gentlemen before that committee are herewith given. The list comprises:

Edwin F. Atkins, vice president and acting president of the American Sugar Refining Co.; Charles R. Heike, former secretary American Sugar Refining Co.; James H. Post, president National Sugar Refining Co. of New Jersey; William A. Jamison, manager of Arbuckle Bros.; William G. Gilmore, general manager Arbuckle Bros.; Claus Spreckels, president Federal Sugar Refining Co.

Particular attention is directed to the statements of Mr. Post, Mr. Jamison, and Mr. Gilmore, although it would be a mere juggler of words who would pretend that the hostile meaning of either Mr. Atkins, of the Sugar Trust, or of Mr. Spreckels, the "angel" of the Hardwick committee, is any less clear and manifest.

References are to pages of the Hardwick hearings.

EDWIN F. ATKINS, VICE PRESIDENT AND ACTING PRESIDENT AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. If we should reduce in this country the tariff on sugar, if we should wipe it out, you say it would almost destroy the cane-sugar industry in this country and the beet-sugar industry?
Mr. ATKINS. Why, I think it would, because $1.34 a hundred is a great part of the price, you know.
Mr. HINDS. And I suppose a reduction of the duty would tend proportionately to check the industry?
Mr. ATKINS. I think that a moderate reduction could be made without any serious injury.
Mr. HINDS. But if it went beyond a moderate reduction it would check the industry?
Mr. ATKINS. It would.
Mr. HINDS. If our best beet-sugar and cane-sugar industry was checked, where would we look for the sugar to make up the difference?
Mr. ATKINS. Russia is increasing at the rate of about a million tons a year. There are rafts and rafts of sugars all over the world. I think the world's production is 17,000,000 tons.
Mr. HINDS. Where should you say we would get it? Would Cuba be able to furnish part of it?
Mr. ATKINS. Cuba would increase somewhat. Java, probably, would be the country to make up the deficiency.
Mr. HINDS. What would they send to us—what kind of sugar?
Mr. ATKINS. They send sugar that tests about 96, the same as the Cuban sugars.
Mr. HINDS. That would be raw sugar?
Mr. ATKINS. Raw sugar.
Mr. HINDS. How would that get to the American people? That would come to New York to be refined, or to New Orleans, would it?
Mr. ATKINS. To all of the Atlantic ports and Gulf ports; yes.
Mr. HINDS. And there it would be refined?
Mr. ATKINS. Yes. Every year, now, we import Javan sugars late in the season, after the Cuban sugars give out.

Mr. HINDS. That is, there would be a considerable increase of the cane sugar to take the place of the beet sugar that would go out under a lowering of the tariff?

Mr. ATKINS. If you wiped out the domestic production.

Mr. HINDS. Yes; or if you checked it?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes; if you seriously checked it.

Mr. HINDS. Yes.

Mr. ATKINS. But a moderate reduction would not check it.

Mr. HINDS. So that a serious check to that industry by lowering the tariff would tend to increase greatly the business of the refining companies?

Mr. ATKINS. It would increase the business of the refining companies.

Mr. HINDS. So that a reduction of the tariff passing beyond a moderate amount would tend to the prosperity of the refiners and to the detriment of the beet-sugar people?

Mr. ATKINS. Take the independent refiners, outside of our concern at all, that represent more than half the supply of the United States. They say, and I think they say truly, that it is for the refiners' interest to have a low rate of duty rather than a high rate of duty, and reduce the basis of value upon which they can sell. The lower the price of the refined sugar the greater is the consumption. I think their position is well taken. (Pages 173–174.)

CHARLES R. HEIKE, FORMER SECRETARY AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar could we produce either cane or beets in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then, that would destroy the industry absolutely in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And you would approve of that?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. As a refiner and an importer of raw sugars, you would approve of that?

Mr. HEIKE. As a private citizen; yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. But as a manufacturer?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes; but I would take 20 years to do it in. Louisiana, for instance, would have to grow cotton and stop growing sugar cane (p. 292).

JAMES H. POST, PRESIDENT NATIONAL SUGAR REFINING CO. OF NEW JERSEY.

Mr. SULZER. Do you consider the beet-sugar industry a competitive industry?

Mr. POST. It certainly is; yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. The beet-sugar prices and the cane-sugar prices are about the same?

Mr. POST. About 10 cents a hundred difference only. That is a condition that has arisen from custom for a great many years.

Mr. SULZER. It is so small that it does not amount to anything to the consumer?

Mr. POST. No; but it amounts to a good deal to the manufacturer.

Mr. SULZER. I am especially interested in the consumer.

Mr. POST. Yes; but he is not worrying about the price he pays for sugar.

Mr. SULZER. The consumer is not?

Mr. POST. No; he is not.

Mr. SULZER. Why do you say that?

Mr. POST. Because the price has been so terrifically low for years as compared with the cost of producing it.

Mr. SULZER. Do you mean to say that the consumers of this country are satisfied with the prices they are paying to-day for sugar?

Mr. POST. They seem to be.

Mr. SULZER. You have not heard any complaints?

Mr. POST. Not where I come from; no.

Mr. SULZER. You have heard no complaints at all?

Mr. POST. No.

Mr. SULZER. If you were a Member of Congress you would hear complaints, I think.

Mr. POST. If Congress did not need the revenue from sugar. That is a different proposition. But they have to have it from something, and sugar seems to be the thing that has paid a part of it for a great many years. As far as I personally am concerned, I would like to see free sugar. As we look at the country at large, however, I think it would be a very unfair proposition.

Mr. SULZER. But you do say that free sugar would give the people of the country sugar at least a cent a pound cheaper?

Mr. POST. Oh, yes; that is, 80 cents to each person throughout the country every year (p. 527).

Mr. Post, it may be noted, gave the qualification to his testimoney which enables members of the Hardwick Committee and others to deny that the Sugar Trust officials or its allies advocated free sugar. Mr. Post said: "As far as I am personally concerned I would like to see free sugar." Seizing upon the use of the word "personally" Members pretend that Mr. Post does not speak with authority. How anxious they are to escape the appearance of acting in this matter in a way pleasing to the Sugar Trust. Of course nobody will be so obtuse as to contend that if Mr. Post and his refining interests were not anxious for free sugar he would "personally" suggest anything that could be distorted into free sugar.

WILLIAM A. JAMISON, MEMBER OF ARBUCKLE BROS.

Mr. RAKER. You people are not affected in any way by the sugar-beet industry in the West, are you? Leave out Michigan to start with. I mean out in Utah, Colorado, and California.

Mr. JAMISON. We are only affected so far as they come East to interfere with the distribution of sugar in the fall and spring. They come pretty well east.

Mr. RAKER. Are you in any wise affected by the cane-sugar people in Louisiana and Texas, so far as prices are concerned?

Mr. JAMISON. We are a competitor with New Orleans.

Mr. RAKER. To what territory?

Mr. JAMISON. Chicago is the principal point.

Mr. RAKER. The Louisiana cane sugar goes to Chicago?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes; at times.

Mr. RAKER. There is not much, though, is there?

Mr. JAMISON. I think the rate is the same to both points. Cincinnati——

Mr. RAKER. Michigan sugar, you say, competes with yours in New York?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes; the Michigan sugar has been down to New York State and all through there. It has interfered with us very largely in sales in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Mr. RAKER. And West Virginia?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. How would it affect you if there was no tax on the importation of sugar—raw sugar?

Mr. JAMISON. I think it would enable us to run more constantly.

Mr. RAKER. What do you mean by that, now?

Mr. JAMISON. To keep up the capacity.

Mr. RAKER. Will you explain it?

Mr. JAMISON. I mean we would be able to sell more sugar.

Mr. RAKER. Do you not have a supply all the time?

Mr. JAMISON. Well, we are not able to run full at all times.

Mr. RAKER. Because of the way raw sugar is shipped into the United States?

Mr. JAMISON. Oh, no; on account of the beet product. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous and we would probably sell more sugar. If the duty was removed, I mean to say.

Mr. RAKER. Suppose the duty was taken off. Where would the beet-sugar man land?

Mr. JAMISON. Some of them, I suppose, would still be able to compete. Others would have to——

Mr. RAKER. Have you investigated that subject so as to be able to inform the committee on it from a fairly close analysis of the matter?

Mr. JAMISON. No; I hardly think I could give you much information on that subject.

Mr. RAKER. You are not prepared to give us any?

Mr. JAMISON. No.

Mr. RAKER. You do not know whether that is simply a clear bonus or not, and whether or not they could get along just as well without it as with it, do you?

Mr. JAMISON. I do not think they could.

Mr. RAKER. You do not think they could?

Mr. JAMISON. No, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Have you anything on which you could base that statement? I am seeking information. Of course, several men have said so, but when you get right down to asking them to explain it, they say, "You can not do it, because you can not." That may be a good explanation, but it never appeals to me very strongly.

Mr. JAMISON. I do not think I could give any information that would be authentic or that would help the committee in any way.

Mr. RAKER. Then we shall have to leave it at that. Do you know anybody that could?

Mr. JAMISON. I guess a good many beet-sugar men would be able to give you all the inside information you want.

Mr. RAKER. But that comes from an interested source, you know. I wanted some one who had made a study of the sugar business but was not interested in that particular line.

Mr. JAMISON. Well, we certainly believe that they do need the protection that they have to-day.

Mr. RAKER. Well, from your investigation and analysis of the subject, from a clean-cut business point of view, considering not only the manufacturer, but the consumer—and I think both of them ought to be treated fairly—with that idea in view, what would you think would be a fair compensation?

Mr. JAMISON. I think there should be a cent a pound taken off at the present time at least; and later——

Mr. RAKER. A little more?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes; until it is entirely removed.

Mr. RAKER. Can the sugar-beet men come back and say that you make this statement because you are not interested in the beet-sugar industry, and therefore are prejudiced against them?

Mr. JAMISON. I do not think that would be the correct way of putting it.

Mr. RAKER. I put it strongly in that way, so as to give you a chance to explain it. That is the reason I do that.

Mr. JAMISON. An industry that does not promise to be able to take care of itself, as I have gathered from them they would not be, with free sugar is not worthy of saddling on the American people to the extent of the enormous amount they have to pay in the way of duties.

Mr. RAKER. You mean, then, that the American consumer is paying entirely too much for giving a few men an opportunity to be engaged in one small business?

Mr. JAMISON. That is exactly it.

Mr. RAKER. Do I use that word offensively in any way.

Mr. JAMISON. No.

Mr. RAKER. Is it small compared to the amount of sugar produced and used?

Mr. JAMISON. About 450,000 tons, approximately, I guess. (Pages 1195–1197.)

It may be said for Mr. Jamison that he did not speak "personally" or as an "individual." He simply advocated free trade as a means of killing off beet sugar and permitting the poor, harassed, cane-sugar refining trust a clear field, and the ultimate enlargement of its ability to plunder the consumer. Surely, in the case of the Sugar Trust one may ask, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?

WILLIAM G. GILMORE, GENERAL MANAGER ARBUCKLE BROS.

Mr. MADISON. I was very much interested in your expression awhile ago that the beet-sugar people got into the New England trade at one time, and while the gentleman minimized it, you seemed to feel that they caused some damage. When was that, and what was the extent of the injury?

Mr. GILMORE. The actual injury was not as great, perhaps, as the fright. It was an unheard-of condition, and we thought an untoward condition. If they had margin enough to land and absorb the differential in freight and bring it from the source of its production into New England, we thought that was a very fat margin that would stand that.

Mr. MADISON. What effect did it have on prices?

Mr. GILMORE. It did not have any effect, except that it displaced that much eastern sugar.

Mr. MADISON. Suppose, as a matter of fact, they get to a point where, instead of producing about 600,000 tons of sugar a year, they actually produce a million and a half tons of sugar, what effect would that have?

Mr. GILMORE. It would shut down most of the eastern refineries for a part of the season.
Mr. MADISON. You would have to quit the business?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes.
Mr. MADISON. Then, as a matter of fact, do you regard them as a very serious element of competition in this country?
Mr. GILMORE. As they are now protected?
Mr. MADISON. As they are now protected.
Mr. GILMORE. Yes.
Mr. MADISON. Suppose we just went to work and took the duty off, then what would occur?
Mr. GILMORE. There would be cheaper sugar.
Mr. MADISON. What would be the effect as to you people—beneficial or otherwise?
Mr. GILMORE. It would be beneficial insomuch that we would have only about half the money invested in the job.
Mr. MADISON. It would be beneficial inasmuch as it would destroy the beet-sugar people?
Mr. GILMORE It would keep them at home.
Mr. MADISON. Keep them in a limited locality?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes.
Mr. MADISON. And leave the field to you people that is naturally yours, as you feel?
Mr. GILMORE. Our natural field; yes.
Mr. MADISON In other words, you feel that all east of the Mississippi River, where they can not very well produce sugar beets, is the natural field of the cane-sugar refiner, while the plains and Mountain States, where conditions are favorable to the production of beet sugar, is the natural field for the beet-sugar people?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes; I think so.
Mr. MADISON. And you think they ought to stay there?
Mr. GILMORE. I do not object to their coming on as they are able to do on a commercial basis, but when they come with hothouse protection and invade my territory, I do not like it.
Mr. MADISON. That is the thing that causes you a feeling of resentment against them?
Mr. GILMORE. Of course I would feel that way about it; yes.
Mr. MADISON. In other words, you think the thing to do is to take off the duty, and that it would be to your advantage to take it off as a refiner of cane sugar?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes, sir.
Mr. MADISON. And you would advocate the taking off of the duty?
Mr. GILMORE. I would personally. I am only speaking now personally.
Mr. MADISON. Oh, certainly.
Mr. GILMORE. I am not involving any other of my associates in business.
Mr. MADISON. Certainly; I understand that. You are answering as one student of the proposition.
Mr. GILMORE. As an individual; yes, sir.
Mr. MADISON. That would leave these people in their territory and would leave you east of the Mississippi River in possession of the field?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes. (Pages 1168–1169.)

Mr. Gilmore, general manager of the Arbuckle's refineries, one of the closest allies of the Sugar Trust, it will be observed, also spoke "personally" and as an "individual" in favor of free sugar, from which fact, as in the case of Mr. Post and others, the Hardwick committee and others are able to say the trust is not in favor of free sugar:

CLAUS SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO., YONKERS, N. Y.

Mr. HINDS. Now, Mr. Spreckels, it was testified in Washington that the movement for lowering the tariff on sugar, the movement which is going on now and in which you are interested, that your company had expended $12,000 for literature, etc.
Mr. SPRECKELS. Possibly. I do not know what the amount is. I dare say we have.
Mr. HINDS. I am not criticizing that expenditure. If you have a belief in a certain policy as beneficial to a certain industry, it is perfectly legitimate for you to propagate that idea and the arguments which sustain it. What I want to get at is this: Whether or not your willingness to take trouble and expense in this matter—what the object of that is? Why do you go to so great an expense to accomplish it?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Because it has an advantage in many ways.
Mr. HINDS. To the cane-refining business?
Mr. SPRECKELS. And ultimately to the consumer. Now, if I may answer the question——
Mr. HINDS. Yes.
Mr. SPRECKELS. It gives a larger market not alone for ourselves, but for the beet industry and everybody else.
Mr. HINDS. Now, what I want to get at is, I think we are all interested that the consumer should get sugar as cheaply as possible, consistent with such demands as the Government may have for revenue. What we want to get at is in what method he is going to get sugar the cheapest in the long run.
Mr. SPRECKELS. Well, my answer to that is, remove the tariff absolutely.
Mr. HINDS. Yes; but what I want to get at is this: Whether in doing that you are having in mind a judicious consideration of the interests of the consumer in the long run or whether, possibly, you may not be a little swerved, as we all are, by this imminence of the danger to the cane-sugar industry?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Cane sugar down in Louisiana?
Mr. HINDS. Danger to cane-sugar refining in your refinery and other similar refineries, whether or not you may feel that cane-sugar refining in the United States is menaced as it is in Europe or has been in Europe. It is nearly obsolete there now.
Mr. SPRECKELS. In other words, you want to find out the motive that inspires me?
Mr. HINDS. I think, perhaps, that would be a proper subject of inquiry.
Mr. SPRECKELS. Very well; I will tell you. The larger and the more we can refine, the cheaper the cost per unit. We have less capital invested. We have capital, practically half of it, tied up in tariffs. The interest on that money is worth something, and all that will be eliminated, and we can produce double the quantity with the same capital then that we can now.
Mr. HINDS. Well, that is a legitimate business interest.
Mr. SPRECKELS. And ultimately, the consumer gets the benefit of it.
Mr. HINDS. Now, what I would like to get at, Mr. Spreckels, is whether the Sugar Trust sympathizes with you in this matter—whether they are with you in this view and idea.
Mr. SPRECKELS. I do not think they are. I do not know
Mr. HINDS. Have you had any consultation with any of them?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I have talked in a general way, but I do not think they and I agree. I have talked with Mr. Atkins about it. He is the only man I have talked with.
Mr. HINDS. Well, Mr. Atkins is favorable to a reduction of the duty on sugar?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I do not think quite in the same way I am.
Mr. HINDS. In other words, perhaps you would take it all off, would you not, and have free trade?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I would have free trade.
Mr. HINDS. You would have free trade in sugar?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Absolutely. (Pages 2276–2278.)

SPRECKELS, THE ANGEL.

Mr. Spreckels may be considered the "angel" of the Hardwick committee, the chairman of which piloted the Ways and Means Committee of the House through the tangled labyrinth of sugar tariff reduction into the clear footing of free trade. Mr. Spreckels it was that financed the propaganda for free trade that ultimately brought in many yellow petitions signed by John De Jesus Galegos and others.

While the sugar-refining business in the United States has been nearly as crooked as the moonshine whisky industry, Mr. Spreckels has remained pure and undefiled, and now appears in the guise of the one altogether unselfish and philanthropic sugar refiner, who is deeply concerned, not so much for his own profit as for the pocketbook of the consumer. It will be noted, however, that free trade will only be an "ultimate" advantage to the consumer. Says Mr. Spreckels, "And ultimately to the consumer. Why "ultimately"? Why will not free trade be an immediate advantage to the consumer? Is it possible Mr. Spreckels, the one pure, clean, unselfish, philanthropic cane-sugar refiner, proposes to recover all his expense money before slicing the melon with the consumer? According to Mr. Spreckels, the poor "ultimate consumer" will "ultimately" derive an advantage from free sugar. Obviously Mr. Spreckels does not contemplate anything rash in the way of knocking the bottom out of the sugar market, else the ultimate consumer, being always at the bottom himself, would get in on the ground floor and begin absorbing benefits even before the philanthropic Mr. Spreckels and his fellow refiners.

Obviously, also, Mr. Spreckels, in saying that he did not think the Sugar Trust sympathized with him in his free-sugar ideas, was in ignorance of the same views, already expressed to the Hardwick committee by Mr. Jamison, of the Arbuckles; Mr. Gilmore, of the Arbuckles; Mr. Heike, of the American; Mr. Post, of the National, as well as Mr. Atkins, of the American—all Sugar Trust officials and its allies, and all of them for free sugar.

BEET SUGAR NOT TRUSTIZED.

Fifth. The alleged saving of $107,000,000 per annum will not be passed on to the consumers. One-half of this sum must be taken out of their pockets in some form of taxation to replace the lost sugar revenues and so much of the other half will be absorbed by the cane-sugar refiners, no longer hampered by beet-sugar competition and by the middlemen, that the minor portion net to the consumer may be fully offset and more by the loss of the domestic beet-sugar supply, to say nothing of the loss of that industry, which is yet only in its infancy in this country.

Sixth. The Hardwick committee reported, and I quote the report:

That the evidence as taken does not disclose combinations between manufacturers in the beet-sugar industry that have caused or had a tendency to cause a decrease in the cost of sugar beets—

Which means that the farmer is getting paid for his beets; and the alleged showing of the committee that the beet-sugar industry is trustized consists of the following mathematical legerdemain, to wit: The Sugar Trust owns 41 per cent of the stock of those beet-sugar companies that produce 54 per cent of all the beet sugar in the United States.

The Sugar Trust, therefore, controls only about 20 per cent of the total beet-sugar output in the United States, and it is not trustized even under Mr. Bryan's trust plank in the Democratic national platform in 1908, which provides that a corporation shall—take out a Federal license before it shall be permitted to control as much as 25 per cent of the product—

And shall be prohibited from controlling more than 50 per cent of the total amount of the product consumed.

But may I inquire, even though the Sugar Trust had a monopolizing control of the American sugar market, is your remedy the destruction of the trust, or the destruction of the domestic sugar industry?

And where is your justification, and where is the benefit of striking down the wholly independent beet-sugar companies producing one-half of the domestic beet sugar, which companies, in the language of the Hardwick report, "are real competitors of the American Sugar Refining Co."?

HARDWICK REPORT ANALYSIS—CONCLUSION DISPROVED.

The pending bill, being the aftermath of the Hardwick report, I want to give some attention to a report which has played such an important part in this tariff legislation.

It is claimed in the Hardwick report that—

The influence of combination upon the price of refined sugar must be found in the margin between the price of raw sugar and that of refined sugar.

At this point in my remarks I shall insert an analysis of the figures set out on pages 16 and 17 of the Hardwick report in support of the statement I have just quoted, which analysis will clearly show that the figures quoted in the report instead of proving the contention of the report absolutely disprove it. I lay stress upon this analysis because this section of the Hardwick report has been incorporated bodily in the majority report of the Ways and Means Committee, appearing on pages 7 and 8 of that report, and the statement and figures of the Hardwick report is strongly relied upon in the Ways and Means report in support of free sugar.

But in passing let me direct your careful attention to a few of the figures which disprove the proposition said in the Hardwick report and in the Ways and Means report to be proven by them.

The Hardwick report, on page 16, says:

In the four years preceding the formation of that organization—the Sugar Trust—severe competition among the refiners had reduced it—the margin between raw and refined sugar—to an average of 79.6 cents per hundred. In 1885 it was 71.2 cents, and in 1886 it was 78.1 cents per hundred pounds. In 1887, prior to the formation of the trust, 76.8 cents.

Now, mind you, this was in the years preceding the formation or organization of any refiners' trust or combine, and was in the language of the report itself, in the era of "severe competition among the refiners."

Yet, turning now to page 17, and to the year 1909, when trust control had become supreme, even including a sufficient control of the leading beet-sugar companies to support the committee's proposition that this industry is trustized, we find that in that year of grace the margin between raw and refined sugar was only 75.8 cents, that in 1910 it was 74.8 cents, and that in 1911 it was only 89.2 cents, an average of 80.9 cents, as against 75.4 for the antetrust period.

In other words, an analysis of these figures shows that in the era before the Sugar Trust was organized and during a time of severe competition among refiners, and in the present era, when the industry is so trustized that it can only be cured by free trade, the marginal difference of prices between raw and refined sugar was absolutely the same.

But let us look even closer at these figures. In 1886 it was 78.1 cents per hundred pounds and in 1910 it was 78.4 cents per hundred pounds. Further analysis of these figures is unnecessary. You can take the three years preceding the first formation of a sugar combine and you can take the three years preceding the present year of 1912 and you will find, so far as the contention of the committees based on these figures is concerned, an absolutely fatal lack of material difference. I shall, however, for the sake of simplifying the study of them in the RECORD, set down each of these three-year periods in parallel columns:

1886	78.1	1910	78.4
1887	76.8	1911	89.2
Average	75.4	Average	80.9

Or a microscopic and wholly negligible difference of 5½ cents per hundred pounds.

Nor are the committee's explanations or lack of explanations as to variations that actually did occur altogether satisfactory. For instance, the drop in the marginal differences between raw and refined sugar for the years 1898, 1899, and 1900 are attributed to a sugar war between Arbuckles and the Sugar Trust, but no explanation is given for an almost equally marked falling in marginal differences in 1894 and 1895, following the absorption of the Philadelphia independents by the Sugar Trust.

Nor is any reference made to any of the extraneous causes which may have affected the sugar market, such as war, big crops, short crops, and so forth.

The Hardwick report also says, and it is quoted in the Ways and Means report:

It is worthy of note in connection with the figures for the years 1904 to 1909, inclusive, during which the refiners' margin ranged lower, with the exception of the year 1905, than the years immediately preceding them, that the American (the trust) was subjected to the active and progressive competition of independents.

Now, then, may I inquire if the "active and progressive competition of independents" held the margin in 1909 down to 75.8 cents per hundred, what held it down in 1910 to 78.4 cents? And what held it down in 1911 to 89.2 cents? The report saith not.

But these are not the only regards in which this feature of this report falls short. Why the committee saw fit to begin at the year 1885 I do not know, but I do know that the marginal differences between raw and refined sugar for a period of years prior to that year were greater than any that have occurred since that year, the differences being:

	Cents per hundred.
1879	1.88
1880	1.92
1881	2.08
1882	2.06
1884	1.46

I know there is a Sugar Trust. I know there is a Sugar Trust which has robbed the Government and the people of the United States, and which dictates prices both to the producers and the consumers of sugar, and that it has been aided in its career of oppression and extortion both by excessive tariffs and by tricks and jokers in the law. But when a committee undertakes legislation vitally affecting the national revenues and a great national industry and bases its action upon statistics, then I say it ought to quote all the figures and properly analyze them.

The following are the years and marginal differences given in the Hardwick report, arranged in tabular form and followed by the reason given in the report for such variation:

Variation of margin in raw and refined sugar.

EFFORTS OF THE SUGAR TRUST TO DESTROY AND CONTROL BEET SUGAR.

I am well aware of the fact that the majority wish and intend this bill to be considered by the great mass of the people in this country as an attack in their behalf upon the Sugar Trust. I am aware of the further fact that this view is taken of this bill by some of my own constituents, and I have read in the public press of my own State the bald assertion that the Sugar Trust was the sole beneficiary of the tariff. So that opposition to this bill may put one in the false attitude of opposing legislation aimed at the Sugar Trust.

I have already incorporated in my remarks the testimony of Sugar Trust officials and refiners before the Hardwick committee in favor of free trade in sugar, and the testimony of the refiners showing that they all regard beet sugar as a strong, dangerous, and growing competitor.

I have already referred to and proven the fact that the petition propaganda for free sugar was instigated, carried on, and paid for by cane-sugar refiners.

And I shall insert here the summarized findings by the Hardwick committee of the repeated efforts of the Sugar Trust to destroy its beet-sugar competitor. I am at a loss to understand how any member of that committee can vote for free sugar. He must do it knowing that he is playing into the hands of the Sugar Trust.

BEET-SUGAR OPERATIONS OF THE SUGAR TRUST.

[Copied verbatim from Hardwick report.]

(9) The trade war waged in September, 1901, by the American Co. and its allies upon the beet-sugar companies in order to obtain control of them and destroy competition.

(10) The appointment, in December, 1901, by the directors of the American Co. of a committee of four, consisting of Messrs. Havemeyer, Thomas, Palmer, and Donner, for the express purpose of acquiring a large interest and influence in the beet-sugar interests of the United States, the beet-sugar factories having by that time become serious competitors of the cane-sugar refiners.

(11) The purchase by the American Sugar Refining Co., in December, 1902, of $7,500,000 of the capital stock of the American Beet Sugar Co. This has since been sold.

(12) The contract of December, 1902, between the American Sugar Refining Co. and the American Beet Sugar Co. by which the latter company constituted the former its factor or agent for the disposal of its product, agreeing to "avoid the markets of the Refining Co." This agreement has not been in force since 1905.

(13) The agreement in August, 1894, between the Western Beet Sugar Co. and the Western Sugar Refining Co. (American) by which the beet-sugar company agreed to cease to manufacture and sell refined sugar and to manufacture raw sugar only, which the refining company agreed to buy.

(14) The purchase in 1897 by the American Sugar Refining Co. of one-half of the capital stock of the Spreckels Sugar (beet) Co. of California.

(15) The purchase of large blocks of stock from 1902 to 1906 by the American Sugar Refining Co. in the Michigan Sugar Co.

(16) The acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Co., between 1902 and 1906, of large interests in the Great Western Sugar Co., a corporation under the laws of New Jersey, which is influenced by the American Co., through its stock ownership therein.

(17) The acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Co., in 1901, 1902, and 1903, of one-half interest in "The Utah-Idaho Sugar Co."

(18) The purchase by the American Sugar Refining Co., in 1902, of one-half of the capital stock of the Amalgamated Sugar Co.

(19) The acquisition, in 1903, by the American Sugar Refining Co. of a large interest in the Lewiston (Utah) Sugar Co., a projected competitor.

(20) The purchase, in February, 1903, by the American Co. of a large interest in its competitor, the Alameda (Cal.) Sugar Co.

(21) An unlawful agreement of February 19, 1903, between the Alameda Sugar Co. and the American Sugar Refining Co. by which the former company constituted the latter company its factor or agent for the disposal of its product, agreeing to "avoid the markets of the refining company."

Indeed, it seems to us that from its organization, on January 10, 1891, until 1907, at least, almost every step in the industrial development of the American Sugar Refining Co. was a well-considered part of a carefully planned campaign to secure and maintain a monopoly in interstate trade in sugar, to obtain complete control thereof, and to forestall, destroy, or weaken competition therein. Since 1907 new influences have controlled the company, and the testimony does not show a continuation of the policy in investing in competing concerns, but does show that some of the properties previously acquired have been sold.

HOW THE FREE-SUGAR BILL AFFECTED SUGAR-TRUST STOCKS.

But I want now to direct special attention to facts which expose the utter fallacy of any pretense that this legislation is aimed at the Sugar Trust or is regarded by the Sugar Trust or the investing public with any apprehension whatever.

It has been said in explanation of the secrecy in which this bill was evolved, that it was desired to avoid disturbance on the stock exchange, and that this was the reason this proposed legislation was not made public until 5 o'clock p. m., the hour of the convening of the caucus. One would think that as a result of this terrific and unprecedented attack upon the Sugar Trust they would be throwing Sugar Trust stocks into New York Harbor. But what are the facts?

The facts are these—and I quote from the reports of the New York Stock Exchange in the Washington daily papers—the facts are these:

That when the New York Stock Exchange closed on Friday, March 1, 1912, which was before the hour this trust-busting piece of legislation was thundered into the ear of a startled world, the stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. closed at 118½; and that on the following day, to wit, Saturday, March 2, 1912, after this wreck of matter and crash of worlds, the stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. opened on the New York Stock Exchange at 118⅝, an advance of one point. This stock closed on March 9, one week after the publication of this bill at 118½, and on March 12 it reached 119⅝.

On March 14, 1912, the day before the passage of the free-sugar bill in the House of Representatives and while the bill was under debate and when it was known to a certainty that it would pass by an overwhelming majority, the stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. reached 123½ on the New York Stock Exchange, which was the highest point reached by that stock during the years 1911 and 1912.

The highest point reached by the stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. during the year 1911 was 122½ per share.

The highest point reached by the stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. during the year 1912 and prior to Sunday, March 10, 1912, was 120⅝.

By March 14 it had jumped to 123½, as stated.

Between the time, therefore, of the closing of the New York Stock Exchange on March 1, 1912, an hour before the publication of the free-sugar bill, and March 14, 1912, the day before its passage, the stock of the American Sugar Refining Co. advanced from 118½ to 123½, an increase of $5[1] per share.

So this proposed legislation is busting the Sugar Trust like the Supreme Court busted the Oil and Tobacco Trusts, by increasing the market value of their stocks.

[1] NOTE: During the last week of March, 1912, this stock reached 129½, an increase of $11 per share.

Some severe things will be said about this proposed legislation, but nothing so crushing and unanswerable as the stock quotations of the concern at which this legislation is supposed to be aimed. And it is no exaggeration to say that if the pending bill simply provided for the removal of the Dutch standard and nothing else, it would give vastly greater concern to the Sugar Trust than the proposition to wipe out not only the Dutch standard and all other tests, but the tariff as well.

SOME ADDITIONAL REASONS ASSIGNED IN FAVOR OF FREE SUGAR AND ANSWERS THERETO—THE LARGE PROFIT IN SUGAR BEETS.

The alleged large profits in the raising of sugar beets is one of the reasons advanced why sugar can go upon the free list without destroying or badly crippling the domestic beet-sugar industry. I have already referred to the specific finding of the Hardwick committee that—

The evidence as taken does not disclose combinations between manufacturers in the beet-sugar industry that have caused or had a tendency to cause a decrease in the cost of sugar beets.

I have commented upon this finding as indicating that the farmer gets a fair price for his sugar beets. This was the testimony before the committee of Mr. John H. Riley, of Fowler, Colo., Mr. John W. Edgar, of Rocky Ford, Colo., and other beet-sugar raisers in Colorado, who stated that they had no interest whatever in any beet-sugar company. It is true that the fact that farmers, according to the testimony of these witnesses, receive a fair price for their beets is largely due to organized or independent efforts among the farmers themselves, who by reason of the rich and varied crop possibilities of their land may profitably raise other than sugar-beet crops, and who, therefore, are able to negotiate for a fair price for their sugar beets and enforce the same.

Now, these gentlemen testified, and so did other witnesses in the same line, that after paying out $35 and $40 per acre in the production of sugar beets they received $75 or $80 for the product, leaving a net profit of $35 or $40 per acre, and there is some testimony in the hearings showing that sugar-beet farmers have realized more than $50 per acre for their output.

But what Members do not understand is the very limited tracts or areas owned by the beet-sugar farmers and upon which this plant is produced. They do not understand that one man probably could not cultivate and entirely care for more than 5 or 6 acres of sugar beets in a season, which, even at $50 per acre, would yield him very little for his year's work. They do not understand that sugar beets must be produced by hard scientific work and with the aid of floating labor, going from field to field, and that after two or three or four such crops there must be a rotation of crops. To one who knows there is much that is very deceptive in this seeming large profit in sugar beets; there is much hazard in the raising of them; and, taking the proposition by and large, many deductions must be made to arrive at the true profits of the business.

BEET SUGAR AS AN "EXOTIC."

In the same speech in which the foregoing argument is found will also be found the paradoxical statement that beet sugar is an exotic in this country; that it does not belong here; that it is not indigenous; that it is a hothouse proposition, fostered by high tariffs at too great an expense to the American people. The cane lands of the Tropics—of Java and the West Indies and Hawaii and the Philippines—will be described as the natural sugar-producing regions of the earth. Let nature have its own is the substance of this plea.

Yet on page 19 of the Hardwick Report appears the following:

In the year 1910 the world's production of sugar was almost 17,000,000 tons. Of this amount almost one-half (49.5 per cent) was cane and just a little over one-half (50.5 per cent) was beet sugar.

Europe alone produced 8,000,000 tons of beet sugar. Furthermore, beet sugar is rapidly overtaking and forging ahead of cane sugar. Investigations and reports of the Department of Agriculture show that the United States possesses more than 200 times the beet-sugar land of Europe. In the face, therefore, of all the facts, and I have barely touched upon them, the argument that beet sugar is an exotic falls to the ground. I believe the time will come when the United States will produce its own sugar, and that the time may come when it can produce it without the assistance of a bounty from the Government, but that time, in my judgment, has not yet come.

And there is absolutely no reason in statesmanship or economy why sugar should not bear some of the burdens of government, as it has done throughout the entire history of this Government, and as it does in every civilized government on earth, especially when a moderate tax upon it will materially assist in sustaining a national industry, which is an item of great value in the national economy.

DOMESTIC SUGAR CAN NOT WITHSTAND FREE TRADE.

It has been well said that no man ever makes a tariff argument without contradicting himself, and it may be especially noted in the sugar tariff debates that Members blow hot and blow cold with the same breath. In one moment a Member will exclaim that the farmers are making too much money out of sugar beets, and in the next moment he will exclaim that the sugar beet is an exotic, not suited to the conditions in this country. The Member will also make it equally clear in one and the same breath that the large profits of the beet growers and beet manufacturers indicate that they can still profitably continue in business under free sugar, and that the cost of production here is so high that in the general interest the gates ought to be thrown down and the industry swept away in the flood of free sugar. That it would be so swept away there can be little doubt.

The Hardwick report contains the following figures on the cost of beet-sugar production in the United States:

	Per hundred.
Michigan Sugar Co	$3.48
Great Western Sugar Co. (Colorado)	3.43
Billings Sugar Co	3.49
Scottsbluff Sugar Co	3.85
Amalgamated	3.05
Lewiston	3.03
Utah-Idaho	3.53
Alameda	4.32
Spreckels	2.70
Menominee	4.39
Continental	4.08
Iowa	5.14
Carver County	3.75

An average cost of $3.54 per hundred.

The report then proceeds to state that—

Some territory, best adapted to the cultivation of sugar cane, produces raw cane sugar at a cost of about 1½ cents per pound.

And gives the following figures as the cost of producing raw sugar in the countries named: Java, 1½ cents per pound; Philippine Islands, 84 per cent raw cane sugar, three-fourths of a cent per pound; Cuba, 2 cents per pound. To these figures must be added the cost of refining, which is about one-half cent per pound.

With this cost added, therefore, Java can produce refined sugar at 2 cents per pound and Cuba for 2½ cents per pound and the Philippine Islands for 2¾ cents per pound. There can be little doubt that Cuba and the Philippine Islands can produce refined sugar for less than these figures.

Mr. William L. Bass, a sugar planter of Santo Domingo, testified before the Hardwick committee, with reference to his raw sugar, as follows:

I deliver it for 2 cents to the United States. (P. 3931.)

The Hardwick hearings also show that the cost of producing refined beet sugar in Germany averages about $2.40 per hundred, and the ocean freight rate upon this sugar from Hamburg to New York City is only about 12 cents per hundred. From all of the foregoing it is plain that the refined beet sugars of Europe and the refined cane sugars of the Tropics can be laid down in New York at $2.50 per hundred.

The problem therefore confronting us is a simple one. It is this: CAN THE BEET-SUGAR PRODUCERS OF THE UNITED STATES COMPETE WITH $2.50 PER HUNDRED REFINED SUGAR?

On an average it will require 8 tons of 12½ per cent beets, or 6⅔ tons of 15 per cent beets—and I use these two grades only by way of illustration—to produce a ton of sugar, costing the sugar company in either case between $40 and $45 per ton of sugar content. I believe there are exact figures showing that the per ton cost of beet-sugar content to the manufacturer is at the very bottom $2.20 per hundred, or $44 per short ton of 2,000 pounds. This leaves a margin of 30 cents per hundred between what the sugar in the beet costs the manufacturer, say in Colorado, and the price for which imported refined cane or beet sugar can be laid down in New York. Out of this 30 cents the manufacturer must make a profit on the million-dollar investment ordinarily represented by a sugar plant. He must meet depreciation, improvement, and repairs, and all labor and operating expenses. He must also pay freight rates to his markets. What is the freight rate on sugar from Colorado manufacturing points to Kansas City, to St. Louis, to Chicago? Will less than 50 cents per hundred meet this charge?

It does not entirely meet the situation to say that Hamburg sugar could be laid down in New York for 12 cents per hundred. If Hamburg sugar can be laid down in New York for 12 cents per hundred, it can be laid down in Chicago for 12 cents per hundred. Under foreign steamship and American railroad freight traffic and rate arrangements there would be no such thing as an American railroad freight rate on the imported sugar. I mean substantially speaking. I mean that the railroad freight rate would be a wholly negligible quantity. It is a well-known fact that wool can be shipped from Australia to England and from England back to Chicago cheaper than it can be shipped from Denver to Chicago. Any freight-rate expert could fill pages of such instances. Let no mistake be made upon this proposition. The freight rate would afford very little protection and that of the most uncertain and unreliable character. It is a well-known fact in freight traffic that the local freight and its local rate bear the major burden. If the cost of sugar production at Hamburg and Denver were the same, Denver sugar could never get to Chicago. It could never get to St. Louis. It is doubtful if it could ever get to Kansas City. Under such equality of conditions in the cost of production there would be only a local market for the domestic product, and it would not and could not be produced under such conditions. It would simply be another case of the big outside interests killing off the little local concern. The cane-sugar refiners made this so clear to the Hardwick committee that he who runs may read.

The only tenable ground that can be taken and sustained in behalf of free sugar; the only ground that is taken by its advocates in private and also as publicly as they dare, is that the preservation of the domestic industry is not worth the price; therefore let it perish. It is foolish and assinine to deny this. It is flying in the face of all the figures, and in the face of all the contentions of the advocates of this measure, that with free sugar the market price will instantly drop 1½ to 2 cents per pound. If it does it will close every sugar factory in the United States.

DOUBTFUL BENEFITS.

Even under the Wilson bill raw sugar carried a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem, which, with the price of raw sugar 2 cents per pound on the New York market, would be a duty of 80 cents per hundred, plus a differential duty of one-eighth of a cent per pound, or 12½ cents per hundred on refined sugar. There is no precedent in this country to which to appeal in behalf of this legislation. The only issue presented by this legislation is whether, in the belief that we will get domestic sugar a cent and a half per pound cheaper, we will destroy the domestic supply and throw ourselves wholly upon foreign production and place ourselves under the mercy of the International Sugar Syndicate, which fixes the world's sugar prices and determines not only to what countries shall sugar be exported but in what quantities.

And it is not unlikely that we will repeat the experiment on coffee. It will be remembered that at one time the United States derived a considerable revenue from the tariff taxation of coffee, and as the result of an agitation for the "poor man's breakfast table" coffee was placed on the free list. Immediately Brazil laid a heavy export duty on coffee, and from that day to this, we have paid the revenue in the shape of the increased price caused by Brazil's export tax, and Brazil has collected the revenue. There are export duties on Russian sugar. There may be export duties placed upon other sugars. It is not likely that other countries will overlook the opportunity to get their bit out of the great free-trade market of which they are to be made a present in the United States. So that between export duties, the International Sugar Syndicate, the American refiners, wholesalers, and other middle men, we will eventually find ourselves paying nearly as much for sugar as we do now. But meanwhile the domestic industry will have been stricken down and must go through another slow and painful process of rehabilitation.

Members have asked, what do you fear, if the International Syndicate and foreign countries and the refiners and wholesalers and retailers and other things are going to absorb all of this proposed reduction, so that the price of sugar will remain the same; what have you to fear in such an emergency? A nice catch question, but nothing in it. The damage will be done. The cane-sugar refiners will have stricken down their domestic foe, knowing full well that it can not be rehabilitated in many years. Taken all in all, there is more than a possibility, there is a strong probability that free sugar will not be worth the price. These free things seldom are. In the last Congress we threw hides on the free list. We threw away three millions of annual revenues and the price of leather and all manufactures of leather immediately went up and have remained up ever since. Twenty years ago the coffee that is now selling in the grocery stores of this country for 30 cents per pound could be bought for 10 cents per pound.

REFINERS ENTITLED TO NO CONSIDERATION.

The Ways and Means Committee says the refining interest is the most important factor connected with sugar manufacturing in the United States, and requires primary consideration, whereas it is of no importance and requires no consideration.

What is the cane-sugar refiner? What does he make? What does he produce? What does he contribute to the national wealth? Why, he is nothing more than a sort of middle man. He merely puts the raw sugar through a finishing process, which could be as well given it by the maker of the raw sugar, if it were not for the Dutch standard. What difference does it make to the people of the United States whether the sugar refineries are on the East River in New York or in Habana? It simply makes the difference of a few large plants and their employees. For the Committee on Ways and Means to assign to this handful of sugar refiners and their handful of refining plants the place of first importance and entitled to primary consideration in the American sugar question, evinces a fundamental lack of knowledge on the subject, which is about on a par with its scheme of crushing the Smelter Trust by taking zinc ore, carrying a duty of $20 per ton, and throwing it on the free list. The Smelter Trust will be thankful for small favors. It may be pleaded, however, in extenuation of the action of the committee with reference to zinc, that this product is a necessary of life, and that the poor man is entitled to his daily zinc unburdened by tariff taxation. Zinc is a very large item in the poor man's cost of living. Therefore let it be free. The poor man, it is true, may not be aware of the great burden of zinc taxation he is staggering under; he may not know what a large part of the crushing load of the high cost of living is due to the existing duty on zinc ore; but he shall have his zinc free, whether or no.

HIGH SUGAR AT HOME.

The business practice of sugar manufacturers in shipping their product long distances and there selling it cheaper than at the point of production is a much-used argument against domestic sugar concerns since the pending bill came up. In the estimation of many such a condition is an all-sufficient reason for free sugar.

I remember when I was a boy, living in a small Missouri town, hearing my father complain that the flour ground in the near-by mill could be bought cheaper in St. Louis than at home. I have heard this complaint against home industries ever since. I have heard it said that the apples and peaches grown upon the great western slope of the Rocky Mountains in Colorado could be bought in Denver and elsewhere cheaper than in the orchard towns. I have heard it complained that the fruits of California could be bought cheapest in New York; that the watches of Elgin, Ill., can be bought cheapest in Europe; that the John Deere plow can be bought cheapest in South Africa; that the products of the Steel Trust can be bought cheaper any place in the world than in the United States. There seems to be some universal law of trade productive of these results. I do not know what it is. I simply know it is not the tariff, because if it was the tariff, then I should expect it to be confined only to protected industries and only to subjects of import taxes and only to things coming into the United States from some other country, whereas I find it in all things everywhere and whether taxed or untaxed.

THE REMEDY?

Are the beet-sugar manufacturers making undue profits? Perhaps they are. The advocates of this bill have produced figures to prove that they are.

Are the beet-sugar growers getting too much for their beets? Perhaps they are. The advocates of this bill have produced figures to prove that they are.

Do the sugar makers charge the home folks more for sugar than they charge outsiders? Perhaps they do. And, so far as I am informed, I believe they do.

Is the price of sugar too high? I believe it is, although this is due not to one cause but to many causes. Like the high cost of living generally, it is made up of a multitude of things, whether these things are under high tariff, low tariff, or no tariff, and whether produced in this country or other countries.

All of the foregoing things being true, what are you going to do about it? Close the sugar factories? Is this the remedy? The patient having a number of bad symptoms, must he therefore be killed? Do not take a good slice off the tariff and off the refiners and off the beet growers and off the wholesalers and off the retailers, but just take it all off in one place.

I have studied this question a great deal. I have sought information from every source. I have felt the force and justice of the general demand for substantial reductions in tariff duties and that each industry and each section of the country must contribute to the common cause. And I stood ready to do my part and vote to cause the State I represent and its products and industries to make their just contribution. And when I voted for a reduction of 50 per cent in the duties on raw wool I cast a vote that met with the approval of my conscience, whether it met with the approval of the woolgrower or not, and enabled me with a clear conscience to vote for similar reductions in cotton manufactures, of which my State has none.

But I did not know that when I returned to the regular session of Congress I would be called upon to make contributions as follows: Tungsten, 100 per cent; zinc ore, 100 per cent; zinc pig, 60 per cent; lead ore, 60 per cent; lead pig, 70 per cent; sugar, 100 per cent; and now, in all probability, wool, 100 per cent.

I repeat, I did not know that I would be called upon to make such contributions as these in order that the majority in the House of Representatives would be able to show the country that it was making average reductions of 35 per cent all along the line.

And I do not believe that when the record is finally made up I will be called upon, or that my State will be called upon, to make any such contributions. The voice of the West is weak in the House of Representatives. Its numerical strength is small. But elsewhere, and by virtue of that constitutional equality of representation which was intended to guarantee each section of the Republic, and the interests of each section, equality of representation, the matters of which I complain will receive consideration which they have not received here; and when this is done I shall confidently anticipate a result which will not strike down any industry or which will make any industry, by reason of its locality or by reason of the numerical weakness of its representatives, contribute more than its share to the general welfare in order that more widely distributed industries or industries more powerfully represented numerically may contribute less than their share.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of the agricultural bill I tried to call attention to the fact that tariff legislation enacted by the majority party so far, as well as proposed legislation, was unfavorable to the agricultural interests of the country. The proposed bill, it seems to me, is against the agricultural interests of the country. It surrenders an important market for American products in Cuba. The Spanish-American War brought us into closer relations with the Cuban people, and as a result a preferential treaty was negotiated which gave the products of the soil of the United States admission into Cuba at 20 per cent under the regular custom rates, and the chief product of Cuba, which is sugar, was admitted to this country at 20 per cent preferential rates as against the world. If this bill passes admitting sugar of the world free, there will no longer be a reason for the continuance of the preferential treaty between this country and Cuba, as the sugar rebate is the Cuban end of the treaty. Since that treaty went into effect our trade with Cuba has doubled. In 1909 we sold there $48,000,000 worth of American products. During the calendar year of 1911 the sales amounted to $62,000,000. The cancellation of that treaty will not only affect the beet-sugar farmer, but it will affect the wheat fields of the West, the products of which go to Cuba in the shape of a million barrels of flour annually. Not only that, but the potato growers of the Northern States, from Maine to the Dakotas, sent in 1910 to Cuba potatoes to the amount of more than a million bushels, and during the calendar year of 1911 they sent to Cuba potatoes to the amount of a million and a half bushels. That does not take into account shipload after shipload of Maine potatoes that went to Cuba and were sold in that market through the port of St. John, New Brunswick. It seems to me that we should not trifle with so important a market.

If we pass this bill, in my judgment, the result will be that we will simply turn a sixty-two million dollar Cuban market over to Canada. Canada is already negotiating with the British West Indies for the purpose of securing the flour trade now controlled by the United States in those islands, amounting to millions and millions of dollars. By giving Canada a preferential rate of 24 per cent, her flour would go in there to the exclusion of ours. The New York Produce Exchange is raising its voice at the present time trying to engage the Government in activities to prevent the enactment of that treaty. If we pass legislation which results in the cancellation of the Cuban treaty, Canada, naturally, will at once seek to get control of a far better market in Cuba than the British West Indies would be to her. I do not believe that we can afford to throw away so good a market, which has been won through war and is practically the only commercial result of the Spanish-American War, in which we expended lives and treasure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BULKLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM PIERCE FRYE, late a Senator from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of WILLIAM PIERCE FRYE the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 89) to amend joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States.

THE SUGAR SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "shall be admitted free of duty," line 10, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Ninety-five and one-half hundredths of one cent per pound."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered and which I hope will prevail will reduce the present duty on sugar one-half. I offer this amendment not because I believe the sugar industry is in need of protection, for I do not believe that it needs any protection, but I offer it because the Government is in need of revenue until some change is made in our revenue laws which will more safely permit the removal of all the duty on sugar. I believe we find ourselves in about the same condition, except with reference to revenue, which existed in this country when the McKinley act was under consideration. The author of that measure, when that bill was before the House, made use of the following language:

I would have preferred, Mr. Chairman, if the article of sugar could have been left in the tariff schedule upon the dutiable list. This, however, was not practicable in the presence of an almost universal sentiment in favor of the removal of the entire duty upon this great article of universal family use.

Public sentiment is and should be back of every statute. It should be the foundation of every great reform. If our acts are to be truly representative of those whom we represent, we should, in the determination of these questions, give heed to the public sentiment. When the McKinley bill was passed there was a universal demand for the removal of the duty on sugar. There is a universal demand now for the removal of this duty, if I read public sentiment aright, and I for one believe that this sentiment is founded upon a sound governmental policy.

Four years after the passage of the McKinley bill, and at the time the House was considering the Wilson bill, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who is an authority on all tariff questions, made use of this language:

The so-called McKinley bill found this article (sugar) bearing a heavy duty. It was a revenue duty, because only one-tenth of our entire consumption was produced in this country and the other nine-tenths was produced abroad. The tariff became a direct tax upon the consumer and was paid by him.

[Applause.]

For more than 100 years we have been giving protection to this industry—first by tariff duties, then by bounties, and again by tariff duties—and yet to-day we produce in continental United States only about 20 per cent of our entire consumption of sugar and import from our insular possessions and foreign countries about 80 per cent of our consumption. The present duty of $1.90 per hundred pounds on refined sugar I believe is as much of a tax on the consumer to-day, and he has to pay it just as truly as he had to pay it when we produced but 10 per cent of what we consumed. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of that degree of protection that measures the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, but I do not believe there is any material difference in the cost of producing sugar at home and abroad. It is a well-known fact that we receive every year from the Hawaiian Islands about $40,000,000 worth of sugar. This sugar is produced in the cane fields of those islands by Chinese and Japanese laborers, who work at from $16 to $20 per month. These laborers board themselves and commence work at 4 o'clock in the morning and quit work at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, with only one-half hour for noon. I understand that practically the same conditions surround the production of sugar in Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and we all know that the conditions of labor in the cane fields of Louisiana are but little better than slavery.

The great policy of protection has been maintained in the past and is maintained to-day on the broad principle of protecting American labor and maintaining an American wage scale; but here we are asked to vote protection to an industry that does not employ American labor, nor does it pay an American wage scale. That is protection run mad. So far as cane sugar is concerned, therefore, I am satisfied that the cost of production in this country does not exceed the cost of production abroad, and that, measured by the rule of the Chicago platform, the cane-sugar industry is not entitled to any protection whatever.

But the beet-sugar industry presents a more difficult problem. While the report of the Hardwick investigating committee contains the statement that it costs more to produce beet sugar in this country than it does abroad, that committee was not commissioned to, and did not carefully consider, the question of the cost of producing beet sugar either at home or abroad. It made no such investigation of the cost of the production of beet sugar as the Tariff Board made on the woolen and cotton schedules. While I have no desire to minimize the work of that committee, yet I submit there are not sufficient facts in the report to warrant the statement which is contained therein with regard to the cost of producing beet sugar at home and abroad. This statement is largely made from the statements sent to the committee by the various beet-sugar companies of this country, the publication of which statements, for some unaccountable reason, has been suppressed. That this investigating committee did not go carefully into the question of the cost of production, but rather accepted these statements made by the various managers of beet-sugar factories, who were interested in showing large production costs, is apparent from the following table:

Cost of producing beet sugar in 13 factories for 1910–11, as claimed by such factories.

	COST PER 100 POUNDS.
Michigan Sugar Co.	$3.48
Great Western Sugar Co.	3.43
Billings Sugar Co.	3.49
Scott's Bluff Sugar Co.	3.85
Amalgamated Sugar Co.	3.05
Lewiston Sugar Co.	3.03
Utah-Idaho Sugar Co.	3.53
Alameda Sugar Co.	4.32
Spreckels Sugar Co.	2.70
Menominee Sugar Co.	4.39
Continental Sugar Co.	4.08
Iowa Sugar Co.	5.14
Carver County Sugar Co.	3.75

Certainly no important legislation should be predicated on such a basis as this. If we examine this showing, we find that for the same year it cost the Spreckels Sugar Co. $2.70 per 100 pounds to manufacture beet sugar, while it cost the Iowa Sugar Co. $5.14 per 100 pounds to manufacture beet sugar. The Iowa Sugar Co. is a prosperous concern, making about $16,000 during the year; and if it can make money on a production cost of $5.14 per 100 pounds, obviously beet-sugar factories like the Spreckels Sugar Co., with an annual capacity of 70,000,000 pounds, can net a fabulous return on a productive cost of $2.70 per 100 pounds. The admitted difference in the cost of production of these two factories is $2.44 per 100 pounds, or $0.0244 per pound. This multiplied by 68,452,800 pounds, the product of the Spreckels Sugar Co. for the year 1910–11, equals $1,670,980.32 in profits to the Spreckels Sugar Co., if its profits were limited to what it saved in the cost of making sugar, as compared with the cost of the Iowa Sugar Co. If the Iowa Sugar Co. can make money on a production cost of $5.14 per 100 pounds, obviously the Spreckels Co.'s profits exceed $1,670,982.32 on a capital stock, the book value of which is shown to be but $2,450,077.48.

Considering the beet-sugar industry, therefore, in the light of the evidence produced before the investigating committee, I am unable to see that the industry needs protection. I do not believe that it does.

But some one may say that the removal of the duty on sugar operates in the interest of the American Sugar Refining Co., the Sugar Trust. Is this true? In times past who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee demanding the retention of the duty on sugar? Was it not the beet-sugar manufacturers? The beet-sugar manufacturer has been loudest in his demand for the retention of the duty on sugar. But who owns the stock in the beet-sugar factories of the United States? Officials of the American Sugar Refining Co., commonly known as the Sugar Trust, appeared before the Hardwick investigating committee and admitted that they owned 41 per cent of the stock in 11 of the principal beet-sugar companies of the United States. These 11 companies produce more than 50 per cent of the beet sugar made in this country. The following information was furnished the committee by the Sugar Trust.

If, as suggested, the Sugar Trust is the party demanding the removal of the duty on sugar, we have this very anomalous situation. The Sugar Trust wants free sugar. The beet-sugar manufacturers want the tariff on sugar retained. The Sugar Trust owns 41 per cent of the capital stock of the beet-sugar factories, which produce over one-half of the entire beet-sugar production. The hyprocrisy of such a claim is apparent on its face. It may be that the American people will continue to pay the tax on such a theory without protest, but I doubt it. Certainly legislation as important as this should not be predicated upon such a hypothesis.

That the Sugar Trust is anxious to retain the duty of $1.90 per hundred pounds on sugar is apparent when we remember that it has scattered beet-sugar factories over 17 States, interested local capital in them in order to give the investment local color, that it may make its demands through that capital to the Members of Congress in support of what seems to me to be an indefensible tax upon the American people. The tariff on sugar yields to the Government about $53,000,000 annually. The sugar consumed in the United States is largely imported, and as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said in 1894:

> The tariff on sugar became a direct tax upon the consumer, and it was paid by him.

But the $53,000,000 annually is not all that the consumer of sugar pays because of this tax. This amount is collected on imported sugar only. The Sugar Trust and the beet-sugar factories, instead of the Government, collects an additional amount, equal to the tariff, on every pound of sugar which is produced in continental United States, the Hawaiian Islands, the Philippine Islands, and in Porto Rico. The total consumption of sugar in the United States for the year 1910 was about 3,350,000 tons.

We received sugar from our insular possessions upon which we did not pay duty, as follows:

From Porto Rico, 569,039,881 pounds; from the Hawaiian Islands, 1,110,594,466 pounds; from the Philippine Islands, 175,869,739 pounds; or, 1,855,504,086 pounds of sugar from our insular possessions upon which no duty was collected. In addition to this, we produced in continental United States of cane and beet sugar 1,775,338,000 pounds, on which no tariff duty was paid. Last year we consumed in the United States 7,360,126,811 pounds of sugar, on only 3,918,593,677 pounds of which was a duty paid. We consume more than 22 per cent of the world's production of sugar, or 80 pounds of sugar for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

The heavy tax on these consumers of almost 2 cents per pound for all the sugar they consume is unreasonable.

For 10 years the Sugar Trust has been able to purchase raw sugar from Cuba and the West Indies for less than $2.20 per 100 pounds, and the average freight on the same to New York has not exceeded 15 cents per 100 pounds, making the average cost of raw sugar to the Sugar Trust for the last 10 years of less than $2.35 per 100 pounds. During this same period the English refiners purchased raw sugar in the open market on board ship in English ports at $2.37 per 100 pounds. The English refiners refined sugar and, for a period of 10 years, sold it at wholesale at an average of $2.75 per 100 pounds. The Sugar Trust in the United States during the same period has maintained an average wholesale price of $4.84 per 100 pounds. The net result is that the wholesalers in this country have been obliged to pay an average of $2.09 more per 100 pounds than was paid by the English wholesalers for refined sugar. During all that time we have maintained a tariff of $1.95 per 100 pounds on refined sugar, except for the year 1910, when the tariff was $1.90 per 100 pounds.

In this connection the following table, compiled from the Statistical Abstract for 1910, completely demonstrates the proposition laid down by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that the duty on sugar is a direct tax on the consumer and is paid by him.

It seems to me that an examination of this table can not fail to convince one that the tariff on sugar is a consumption tax, and that the consumer pays it. For each year from 1900 to 1910, inclusive, it is demonstrated that the difference in the price of sugar at Hamburg and New York and Great Britain and New York was the amount of our tariff plus freight charges, insurance, and other expenses. It is obvious, therefore, that the increased cost to the consumers of sugar in the United States by reason of the protection that has been maintained on sugar for the past 10 years amounts to at least the amount of the tariff.

But it is said we are developing an industry in the United States. In 1902 we produced in continental United States 1,097,862,181 pounds of sugar, but we consumed that year 5,018,972,657 pounds of sugar. In 1910 we produced in continental United States 1,775,338,000 pounds of sugar and consumed 7,360,126,811 pounds of sugar. In other words, during the last eight years we have increased our production of sugar 677,475,819 pounds, while our consumption of sugar during the same period has increased 2,341,154,154 pounds, or our consumption has increased four times as fast as has our production. Eighty years ago we produced 49 per cent of the sugar we consumed; 70 years ago we produced 48 per cent of our consumption; 60 years ago we produced 47 per cent of our consumption; and to-day, after a century of protection to the sugar industry, we are producing in continental United States only about 20 per cent of our consumption. At this rate, how long will it take to establish the sugar industry? It ought to occur to us that it is too costly to maintain this industry by taxing the consumers of sugar.

In 1883 the Government was collecting in the neighborhood of $80,000,000 annually more revenue than it could expend, and, over the protest of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Congress made a reduction of 8 cents per pound on tobacco. The suggestion of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] that if the Government faced a deficit by the removal of the duty on sugar the internal-revenue tax on tobacco be increased 8 cents per pound, is a good one. Such policy would more than secure the Treasury against a deficit by reason of the removal of this obnoxious tax.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is no more a protectionist now than he was in 1894. When the Wilson bill was before the House, he said:

We took the duty off in 1890, and reduced the price of sugar, because we produced but 10 per cent of the sugar we used and imported 90 per cent, and I hope that fact will get to the understanding of my friend from Kansas [Mr. Simpson.]

A vote for the restoration of the duty on sugar is a vote of $5,000,000 a year to the gentlemen who own the sugar plantations in the Hawaiian Islands; it is a vote of $10,000,000 a year to those who own the sugar plantations in Louisiana and other places in the South and West; and therefore I am opposed to voting a tariff on sugar.

But in all justice to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] I should say that he argued at that time for the retention of a bounty on sugar. While I am opposed to a tariff on sugar, if that industry needs assistance it should be extended in the way of a bounty raised by a tax on incomes, or a revenue tax upon luxuries, and not by a tax upon the necessities of life, which in the end must be paid by the man that toils. It is high time that we adopt a policy that will compel those who enjoy the luxuries of life to pay their just proportion of the cost of building and maintaining American industries. The tax to maintain such industries should be borne by the people according to their ability to pay it. The duty on sugar is a tax on hunger; if it is maintained it must, in a large measure, be paid by the man who can least afford to pay it—the man that toils. Let us remove this tax from a prime necessity and place it upon a luxury.

I find myself in complete sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the late Senator Allison, when the Wilson bill was before Congress. If the duty on sugar was indefensible then, it is indefensible now. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] when he said:

I oppose the restoration of the duty upon sugar, because it is putting a tax on every man's breakfast of at least $1 a year for each person who sits down to that table.

And I most heartily concur in what was said by the late Senator Allison:

If I had my way about it I would strike from this bill every vestige which provides for a duty on sugar, * * * and if additional revenue was required, I would look around among the luxuries that are consumed by our people and find that revenue.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "shall be admitted free of duty," in line 10, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the words "1 cent per pound."

Mr. LENROOT. As I listened to the remarks a few moments ago of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] I wondered if the distinguished Speaker of this House [Mr. CLARK] or the distinguished leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD] should be the nominee of the Democratic Party for President of the United States—I wondered if either of those gentlemen would visit the State of Colorado in the next campaign. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have voted for a number of tariff bills since the Democratic Party has come into power in this House, bills proposed by the Democratic majority, but, Mr. Chairman, I have never voted for a tariff bill that in my judgment would strike down a single industry in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] And because, Mr. Chairman, it is shown by all of the information at hand that this bill now pending, if enacted into law, will strike down the beet-sugar industry in the United States, I can not support the bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do believe, and the evidence does show, that we can and ought to reduce the duty upon sugar, and we can reduce it very substantially without any injury to either the cane-sugar industry or the beet-sugar industry. The report of the Democratic special committee, as has been shown to-day, states that the cost of producing beet sugar in Germany—the lowest cost, the report states, in the world—is $2.41½ a hundred, while in this country it is $3.54 per hundred, a difference of $1.12½ a hundred pounds.

And who is there on that side of the House who will say that that difference of $1.12½ per hundred pounds will not wipe out the industry? But, Mr. Chairman, a tariff rate of $1 per hundred pounds, such as is proposed in the amendment I have sent to the desk, will give relief to the consumers in this country and at the same time do no injury to either the beet-sugar men or the cane-sugar men in this country. It will reduce their exorbitant profits, but we ought to reduce them.

Mr. Chairman, we have four sugar-beet factories in my State, Wisconsin, but I am not pleading that because we have four large factories in my State that we should stand pat on an unjust sugar duty. I believe in giving them a square deal; in giving them such a rate of duty as will enable them to exist and make a fair profit, but not one penny more. And I know, Mr. Chairman, that they are making an excessive profit now, because when their representative called upon me a few days ago he admitted that while he was sending sugar to New York based upon the New York price, the consumers of Wisconsin and the Middle West, Minnesota and Illinois, buying sugar from his factory, were compelled to pay the New York price plus the freight rate back to the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, allusion has been made to the fact that sugar was made free by the McKinley bill some 22 years ago. I made the motion in that committee to put sugar on the free list, and I did make the remark just read. What were the facts? In 1890 we were producing of Louisiana cane sugar 130,413 tons. We produced of beet sugar 2,203 tons only. We consumed about 1,500,000 tons. So that we produced in this country about 10 per cent of what we consumed. Everybody knows in sober, reflective moments, and even the other side would acknowledge, that where we put a duty upon an article and only 10 per cent of that article is produced here it would have no appreciable effect on the price. I do not mean the duty; I mean the production. And I admitted then, as I admit now, that under those circumstances the duty was substantially added to the price. What is the difference?

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. The "boss" only allows me five minutes, and I can not yield. But, Mr. Chairman, what is the condition now? Why, we produce in this country 1,711,000 tons of sugar, sugar that is free of duty, in this country, and produced here, in Porto Rico, and in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands.

We produce in this country, that pays no duty, nearly half of the sugar that we consume. Cuban sugar paid only 80 per cent of the full duty. Only 75,000 tons came from Europe and paid the full duty. Is there any gentleman here so simple-minded as to believe that that reduction has no influence on the price? If so, let him read the testimony before the Hardwick committee, that when the beet-sugar crop came in it reduced the price of sugar, and when the Porto Rican crop came in it reduced the price of sugar, and when the crop came in from Cuba, with a 20 per cent reduction of duty, it reduced the price of sugar in this country and reduced it below the price of foreign sugar and the duty added. It has been demonstrated by the Tariff Board that the duty does not add to the price where there is competition, and there are cases in that report where not half of the duty was added to the price. But we are not in the same position we were in 20 years ago, when the Republican Party removed this duty and still kept up ample protection by a 2-cent-per-pound bounty paid to the producer. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are quarreling over the paternity of this act.

Mr. WARBURTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, Mr. Chairman, I remember only a short time ago the gentleman from Alabama was interrupted in debate here by a colleague [Mr. CLAYTON] and asked why he did not bring in a bill for free sugar, and he said:

When we want to play fast and loose with the Treasury of the United States, we will bring in a bill for free sugar.

It is currently reported that two weeks ago the gentleman from Alabama wanted a duty of a cent a pound on sugar, and he wanted an excise tax of a quarter of a cent a pound. He thinks he has discovered something now whereby he can get $20,000,000 on an income tax, provided he can get the Supreme Court of the United States to follow out the decision of those two gentlemen who went out from the committee to decide that point, and so reverse themselves. Whether they got the information in the corridors of the House Office Building or not, or wherever they got it, they came back and reported that there was no doubt of its being constitutional, and hence they voted it in. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] is entitled to credit if he desires it, but I want to put in my claim that 22 years ago I moved in committee to put sugar on the free list, at a time, Mr. Chairman, when we did not have the magnificent sugar industry in this country that we have to-day, and when the sugar refiners did not ask for free sugar and were not the only people in the United States that seemed really to want it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, it seems remarkable how our Democratic friends simply skim over the surface and give no thought or study to the very important questions connected with the tariff and the revenue. They seem to think that if it was justifiable in 1890 to put sugar on the free list, it is justifiable to-day. They take no thought whatever of the changed conditions that have come about in the production and consumption of sugar in the last 22 years. In 1890 we had revenue laws that produced $100,000,000 annually and more of surplus revenue. We had used it in purchasing all the outstanding bonds in sight that could be bought, at a high premium, and still the revenue was coming in. The committee looked about to cut out some revenue producer in our revenue laws that would offset the greater part of this $100,000,000 and bring our revenues down more nearly to the point of the demands that could legitimately come upon them. Here was sugar producing $48,000,000 annually of revenue, and by cutting that off, together with other revenues cut out by the bill, we largely accomplished the object. But to-day, so well balanced was the tariff act of 1909, that the annual revenue is just about equal to the annual expenditure. No more evenly balanced revenue measure, in proportion to our annual expenditures, was ever devised.

Our friends do not seem to realize that cutting off from $52,000,000 to $60,000,000 annually by putting sugar on the free list will inevitably produce a deficit, or if they do, they have failed most painfully in substituting anything that will produce $60,000,000 of revenue to take the place of the sugar duty. They cut off the revenue sure enough, but they enact a lawsuit in the way of an income tax, when the United States Supreme Court has already decided against it. In the expressive language of the chairman to his colleague [Mr. CLAYTON], they no longer hesitate to "play fast and loose" with the United States Treasury. They say that their measure is constitutional, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court, and they say, with equal assurance and with no more foundation in fact, that their measure will produce $60,000,000 in revenue. They produce no calculation, no facts from which one can judge of the amount of revenue which such an act would produce if constitutional and in good working order. They can not answer the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], which shows conclusively that the proposed act, working at its best, would not produce $20,000,000 annually.

But they assert that putting sugar on the free list would save annually to the consumer here from 1½ to 2 cents a pound. In the light of facts that assertion is utterly absurd. It is true that the removal of the duty in 1890 removed nearly 2 cents a pound on the wholesale price of sugar. It had some effect on the retail price, but the ultimate consumer got a disappointing amount of good out of it. But then we produced only 10 per cent of what we consumed; the other 90 per cent paid the full duty. Of course in that case the entire duty was added to the price. But it is well known to people who have made any study of economic questions that wherever any substantial part of the consumption of a duty-paid article is produced in the country duty free, the price goes down, often to the whole amount of the duty; but there is always a substantial reduction. Since the report on wool, it takes a very brave and brazen-faced man to deny this proposition.

I will place in the RECORD the annual production of sugar from 1877 to 1911, showing the production in Hawaii, continental United States, beet and cane stated separately, Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippine Islands. This table shows the production in the United States of beet and cane sugar in the year 1890, the date of the McKinley law, 132,616 long tons. The following table shows the sugar produced in United States and Cuba and consumed in United States:

Statistics 1877–1897, except United States beet and Louisiana cane, from Summary of Commerce and Finance, July, 1902, Hawaii, p. 2665; Porto Rico, p. 2737; Cuba, p. 2651; Philippines, pp. 2753–2754; statistics for Louisiana cane sugar and United States beet sugar 1877–1897 from 1908 Statistical Abstract, p. 199; statistics for 1897–1909 from Willett & Gray's Statistical Sugar Trade Journal; 1910–11 estimated by Willett & Gray. Louisiana cane and United States beet sugar figures are "production"; all others are "exports."

Last year, of the sugar consumed in the United States, there was produced as follows—the figures being in long tons, except Porto Rico, where it is metric tons—

Hawaii	485,000
United States:
Beet sugar	445,000
Cane sugar	311,000
Porto Rico	320,000

making a total of 1,711,000 tons of sugar that entered into consumption in the United States, duty free. There was also produced in Cuba 1,900,000 tons that entered into consumption, paying a duty equal to only 80 per cent of the duty on other sugars imported from abroad. The total of the sugars thus entering into consumption free of duty or with a reduction of 20 per cent lacked only 75,000 tons of supplying all the sugar consumed in the United States. It is evident that during the next year the natural growth and increase of production will give us all the sugar which we consume either free or paying 80 per cent of the duty under the present law. One-half the sugar entering into consumption will pay no duty and the other half will pay 80 per cent of the present rates; or the average on the entire crop will pay an amount equal to only 40 per cent of the duty provided against foreign sugar. This is equivalent to six-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

Certainly with the laws remaining as they are to-day it is a good deal more likely that the duty collected will not exceed 40 per cent of the duties prescribed on all sugars consumed in this country than it is to prove that the passage of this bill would be followed by a reduction of 2 cents a pound or of 1½ cents a pound on sugar. All the authorities agree that free sugar, equaling more than one-half our consumption, has a marked effect in lowering prices here from year to year.

Who are asking for free sugar? The refiners of the country. Refiner Claus Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., said before the Hardwick committee:

I would have free trade—absolutely. (p. 2277 and 2278 of the hearings).

Charles R. Heike, secretary American Sugar Refining Co.:

That (free trade) would destroy the industry absolutely in this country, and I would approve of that (p. 292.)

William G. Gilmore, of Arbuckle Bros., refiners:

The thing to do is to take off the duty, and personally I would advocate it (p. 1169).

James H. Post, president National Sugar Refining Co.:

If Congress did not need the revenue from sugar, I would like to see free sugar (p. 527).

William A. J. Jamison, of Arbuckle Bros.:

If there was no tax on the importation of sugar, we would be able to run more constantly and sell more sugar. I think a cent a pound should be taken off at present, and later a little more, until the duty is entirely removed (pp. 1195, 1196).

Edwin F. Atkins, vice president American Sugar Refining Co.:

I think the independent refiners say truly that it is for the refiners' interest to have a low rate of duty rather than a high rate of duty, and reduce the basis of value upon which they can sell (p. 174). Beet sugars are taking away the trade of the refiners year by year (p. 48).

The testimony before the Hardwick committee shows conclusively that if sugar was made free neither Louisiana with her cane sugar nor the Western States with their beet sugar could continue in the business. The loss would be too great. There would be no duty to make up the difference in the costs of producing sugar here and abroad. If this result should follow there would be an actual shortage in the world's supply of sugar of 445,000 tons of beet sugar and the 311,000 tons of the Louisiana cane sugar, to say nothing of its effect upon the 485,000 tons of Hawaiian sugar and the 320,000 tons of Porto Rican sugar. The price of sugar would inevitably advance.

Another potent lesson is to be gathered from the experience of the past year. An alarm was sounded that the world's beet-sugar crop would be 1,000,000 tons short last year, and on the strength of that alarm as to the world's supply, prices went up to 7½ cents a pound, almost doubling. The alarm afterwards proved groundless, founded on a fake or a mistaken report, and the price of sugar promptly went down in the markets of the world to the price prevailing before the scare.

But when they actually strike down the production of sugar in the United States and take it from the world's supply sugar will not only go up to 7½ cents, but will stay there until common sense prevails and the sugar factories of the United States are again opened.

When we put sugar on the free list under the McKinley law we provided against any such collapse of American industries as would have followed by giving a bounty of 2 cents a pound upon all sugar produced here. This bounty acted not only as protection, but as a very active stimulus to the production of cane sugar in Louisiana, and the crop increased rapidly while the bounty law was in force. The gentleman from Alabama provides nothing to save the industry of producing sugar in this country from the blow it will receive if this bill should become a law. The producers of sugar get no encouragement from him except the everlasting smile of assurance that no business interests will be affected by this radical revolution of the policy of 125 years under the tariff on sugar; by this radical departure from the policy of every nation under the sun, each of which has as great or greater duty upon sugar than the United States has now. Let them no longer cite the act of 1890 as a precedent for this action. We did not "play fast and loose" with the Treasury of the United States. We did not make a bill which created a deficit in the revenues of $60,000,000, and we were careful to guard and protect the sugar interests in the State of Louisiana.

We gave them something besides a smile and an assurance in words. We gave them a bounty fully equal to the difference in cost.

Gentlemen of the majority, you intended one of two things when you introduced these two bills. Of course, you had no hope whatever that either would become a law during this Congress, and you put them in hoping that they might help in the next presidential election; and I am bound to consider you as possessed with the idea that if you should get the three branches of the Government you would enact into law not only these two bills but all the other bills which have been introduced in this Congress. If you could write them on the statute book now your fond hopes would be turned into the ashes of disappointment. And yet I could hardly wish you to get as overwhelming a defeat as we did following the passage of the McKinley bill when we put sugar on the free list.

I rejoice in the bills that you have offered and in the work which you have done during this Congress. The people do not believe your empty promises. They see that you are ruining business; that your policy would destroy not only the capitalist but the labor interests of the country. The people are becoming alarmed, and you will hear and feel the rise of indignation of the people of the United States in November next.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, a little while ago the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] made one of the characteristic remarks, that have been so plentiful in this debate, when he propounded this proposition: "Suppose," said he, "that the sugar syndicate of Europe should make up its mind not to let America have any sugar. What would we do then?" The inference then must be that he believes that American enterprise, American agriculture, American success, and American industry would go out of business rather than go to work and feed and keep the people of the United States out of the resources of this wonderful country. Did ever masked selfishness grin so mockingly? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, that is typical of the logic of the gentlemen on the other side. It is just about as logical as all the arguments that we have heard here about the silent mills, the rusting machinery, the smokeless chimneys, the gathering of bats in the mining shafts, and so on, because a majority of this House dares to stick up for a program that will carry out the will of the American people as expressed in the elections. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, gentlemen, you might as well face the fact that with all your calamity howling, the time has come when neither the standpatters, the representatives of special privilege on that side of the House, or their allies on this side of the House, will ever again be permitted to do with this tariff bill what they did to the Wilson bill [loud applause], and never again will the Democracy be throttled in the household of its friends by the forces of special privilege, and those who have practiced and built up power under the rule of gentlemen who have nothing but the wail of ruin left in their statesmanship. A party that had so long the confidence and trust of the American people, and which in its day did such magnificent work for liberty, a party that has now no higher statesmanship than references to calamity, silent spindles, drawn fires, stopped locomotives, and all else in that line with which to emphasize their arguments must be pitied indeed. You are in the wrong day now, because there is a new generation in the field, and you shall not be permitted to thwart Democracy in the work it has to do in lifting unnecessary burdens from the shoulders of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. WARBURTON. May I not have five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the pending amendment is exhausted in two minutes.

Mr. WARBURTON. I want to give a short history of the Wilson bill, Mr. Chairman, and I can not give it in two minutes. [Laughter.]

The McKinley bill placed a duty of one-half a cent on refined sugar, one-half a cent a pound, and gave a bounty of 2 cents a pound. The Wilson bill, as it came into the House from the committee, placed the duty on refined sugar at a quarter of a cent a pound, with a sliding scale on the bounty. By the motion, I think, of the gentleman from New York, the one-quarter of a cent was stricken out, and all reference to the bounty provision was also stricken out.

Mr. PAYNE. What gentleman from New York?

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman who is addressing me now. [Laughter.]. I will read his own words.

Mr. MANN. Read his amendment.

Mr. WARBURTON. I will read his words. He said:

The time came for the preparation of a tariff bill. It came to the House from the Ways and Means Committee with a protective duty for the trust and free sugar for the producer. The Democratic House, aided by a solid Republican vote, made sugar free in the bill, and in that way it went to the Senate. Then the State of Louisiana demanded the fulfillment of the Democratic pledge.

Mr. PAYNE a moment ago said that the sugar industry had not increased much from 1890 to 1894. When he made his speech the cane-sugar industry had more than doubled. It had run up from 300,000,000 pounds to 610,000,000 pounds. The beet-sugar industry had increased from 4,000,000 pounds to 44,000,000 pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time on the pending amendment has expired. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "shall be admitted free of duty," line 10, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "ninety-five and one-half hundredths of 1 cent per pound."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "shall be admitted free of duty," in line 10, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the words "1 cent per pound."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I call for a division on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman comes too late. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph from line 7 to line 10, both inclusive, on page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. Saccharine, 65 cents per pound.

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. WARBURTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am not sure whether this is a sufficient tariff on saccharine or not, but I am quite confident that the amounts proposed in the last two amendments would not be sufficient to protect sugar.

Mr. Chairman, it may be possible that the present duty on sugar might be lowered somewhat without the destruction of the American sugar industry, but we have not at this time sufficient information on the subject to enable us intelligently to pass upon that question. But when gentlemen say, as one gentleman said on this side a moment ago, that he did not know and scarcely believed that any duty was necessary for the maintenance of the sugar industry in this country, it seems that he and other gentlemen making such statements have failed to read the record.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] stated the facts in his exhaustive speech on yesterday. He spent some time in trying to prove that we might be able to compete with the beet-sugar industry of Germany, and then, in answer to the query of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL] as to the effect on the sugar industry of the United States of free importations of cane sugar from the Tropics, he threw his hands up and said in substance: "Of course, no beet-sugar industry, either here or in Europe, can stand the competition of tropical-grown cane sugar." And he stated the facts.

It is not altogether a question of competition with the beet sugars of Germany and Europe, although our beet-sugar industry would be put out of business by that competition. But the destruction of the industry in this country would come from the competition of the great tropical cane-growing regions that can produce cane sugar at a price not to exceed 1½ cents a pound. Nobody denies that, and does anybody believe that you can make sugar either from the cane or from the beet in the United States and pay American wages at any such price?

I want to say to my friends on this side who propose to vote for this bill that they can not be on both sides of this question at one and the same time. Members may justify themselves in voting for this bill on the ground that, without regard to its effect on American industries, there should be cheaper sugar in this country, and that it may be for a time, at least, secured by this legislation. But men can not take at one time both horns of the dilemma. Free sugar means the wiping out of the sugar industry in the United States, and the man who votes for free sugar votes to wipe out the American sugar industry. Anyone who is prepared to do that can vote for this bill, but no one can vote for this bill and lay the flattering unction on his soul that we can maintain the sugar industry of this country and still put sugar on the free list.

This bill means destruction to the sugar industry of this country, just as much as if we should issue letters of marque and reprisal for the destruction of sugar property to the value of $200,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this particular paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert therein an address made by the Hon. CHAMP CLARK at Frankfort, Ky., before the members of the legislature of that State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of the address named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the address referred to:

ADDRESS OF HON. CHAMP CLARK BEFORE THE KENTUCKY LEGISLATURE, FRANKFORT, KY., MARCH 8, 1912.

"I am profoundly grateful to the members of the Kentucky Legislature for their cordial invitation to address them. I was born within 14 miles of the spot where I now stand. There is an old saying, 'Once a Kentuckian, always a Kentuckian,' and, while I am ineffably proud of the imperial Commonwealth of Missouri, which has honored me so often and so highly, I never come within sight of the Kentucky hills or hear the name of the State without a pleasant palpitation of the heart. Here as a boy and youth I worked on a farm, clerked in a country store, taught school, and secured the principal part of my education. Neither time nor absence has diminished my affection for the dear old Commonwealth where I first looked forth upon this glorious world, and where my mother's people have dwelt since the first white settlement. For this reason and for a great many others it is a great pleasure for me to be with you here to-day.

"To-day I came through Lexington, where I attended the university for more than three years—pleasant and profitable years.

"Still o'er these scenes my memory wakes,
And fondly broods with miser care,
Time but the impression deeper makes
As streams their channels deeper wear.

DEMOCRATS IN FIGHTING FETTLE.

"The Democrats are in the finest fighting fettle they have been in since the campaign of 1892. From the convening of the extraordinary session of Congress in 1893 till the 19th of March, 1910, the day on which we completely upset and demolished the standpat Republican machine in the House, the Democrats put in most of their time fighting each other, and constituted a weak, wrangling, jangling, dispirited, despised minority, always expecting defeat. But a change came over the spirit of their dream. They got together on the 19th of March, 1910. Every Democrat toed the mark on that historic occasion. 'Twas worth 10 years of peaceful life, one glance at that array,' and they have been together ever since. The getting together of the Democrats after so many years of wandering in the wilderness will constitute one of the most interesting and instructive chapters in parliamentary history. It was a work of infinite toil, patience, and forbearance. To use a common expression, it was accomplished by constantly rubbing the hair the right way of the hide. Though I was minority leader at that time, I do not deserve all of the credit by a long shot. Every Democratic Member of the House of the Sixty-first Congress is entitled to his full share of the honor. In the words of Admiral Schley, after his famous victory, 'There's glory enough for all.' We not only remodeled and liberalized the rules and restored to each Member his quantum of power, which had been gradually usurped by the House machine, but we put up such a fight against the iniquities of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill as to challenge the attention of the entire country.

"The splendid record of the Democrats of the House in the Sixty-first Congress elected the Democratic House in the Sixty-second Congress, and also elected several Democratic United States Senators and six Democratic governors to replace Republican Senators and governors. I undertake to say without fear of successful contradiction that no minority in any parliamentary body of the world ever made such a record. On that record and on the magnificent record of the Democratic House and the Democrats of the Senate in this Congress we must make the fight this year, not only for the Presidency, but also for the House and Senate.

"In all fairness it should be stated that the insurgent Republicans who helped us win our victories in the Sixty-first Congress acted nobly and deserve their share of the honor. They took their political lives in their hands and fought courageously and patriotically.

KEPT FAITH WITH PEOPLE.

"We have absolutely kept faith with the people. We have redeemed or are in process of redeeming every promise that we made in order to win the election. The people deserve to be treated honestly, fairly, candidly, and courageously. In seeking office men should say what they mean and mean what they say. Pledges made in order to win an election should be religiously fulfilled after the election. The people are entitled to that square deal of which we hear so much and see so little. We achieved the success of 1910 on six principal promises:

"First, to liberalize the rules of the House, which we have done.

"Second, to submit a constitutional amendment for the election of United States Senators by popular vote. This the House did so far as it is possible for the House to do anything. The Senate added certain amendments which threw it into conference; but I have faith that before the session ends the conferees will agree and the amendment will be submitted.

"Third, we promised to economize, and we are doing it.

"Fourth, we promised to pass a bill compelling the publication of campaign contributions and disbursements before the election, and we did that.

"Fifth, we promised to admit New Mexico and Arizona as two separate States, and that has been done. Full-fledged Representatives from these two Commonwealths now sit in the House. It was a great pleasure for me to swear them in.

"Sixth, we promised to revise the tariff downward. There was nothing equivocal about our pledge in that regard. We are fulfilling that pledge as rapidly as possible. We determined to pass one bill for each schedule instead of one blanket revision of the 14 schedules in one bill for three reasons: First, because some schedules are essentially worse than the others; second, because the plan of one bill for one schedule reduces logrolling to the minimum; third, because we thought we had better chances of getting the bills through the Senate, which turned out to be true, for it must never be forgotten that we have not a Democratic majority in the Senate. We also thought we would have a better chance of getting the bills past the President. It turned out that in this we were mistaken, for the President vetoed all our bills, thereby precipitating a tariff fight, which is still on.

TARIFF BILLS PASSED.

"The tariff bills which we passed at the extraordinary session of Congress would have saved to the American people about $500,000,000 a year, and at the same time they would have raised about as much revenue as the Payne tariff bill raises. Five hundred million dollars a year is about $5 a head for every man, woman, and child betwixt the two seas. On an average a family in the United States, which is the unit of civilization, contains five and a half persons. That would have been a saving of about $27.50 to the family. To some people this may seem like a small economy, but the average head of a family in the United States receives only about $400 per annum, and it is a cruel outrage to take from him $27.50 of his meager income and hand it over to the tariff barons. President Taft's veto of our tariff bills at the extraordinary session will prolong the present session for at least two months. Some people think that we went too far in the tariff bills; others think we did not go far enough. That the average citizen indorses our action is demonstrated beyond even the shadow of a doubt by the fact that in the elections last year where the tariff was made the principal issue we won. That was the case in Massachusetts, where Gov. Foss made his fight on the tariff issue almost entirely, and at the by-elections for Congressmen in Nebraska and Kansas. In the latter State we elected two Democratic Congressmen to take the place of two Republicans, the first Democrats to sit in the House from the Sunflower State for a decade. We are now engaged in passing more tariff bills. We have already passed bills revising the metal schedule and the chemical schedule. In a few days we will pass one putting sugar on the free list, and in order to raise the revenues which we lose on sugar we are extending the corporation tax so as to include individuals on net incomes above $5,000, which is to all intents and purposes an income tax, which the consensus of opinion among lawyers holds to be constitutional. We substitute a tax on the incomes of those who are best able to pay taxes for a tax on consumption, which bears heaviest on those least able to pay taxes. We relieve the people of about $150,000,000 of taxes which are paid on sugar, an article of prime necessity, $53,000,000 of which went into the Treasury of the United States and a large part of the rest into the coffers of the Sugar Trust; but the corporation tax will raise about $52,000,000, every cent of which goes into the Treasury of the United States. I feel reasonably certain that the vast majority of the American people will indorse these measures. In my judgment a graduated income tax, with reasonable exemptions, is the fairest and most just tax that was ever levied. It seems that the constitutional amendment authorizing an income tax will be ratified at no distant day by the requisite number of States. Then we will levy a graduated income tax, which will bring into the Treasury of the United States something over $100,000,000 per annum, which will give us a freer hand in revising the tariff. In the passage of the bills which I have mentioned we have literally obeyed the mandate of the Democratic platform adopted at Denver, which declared in favor of an income tax and in favor of reducing the tariff gradually. It must be taken and accepted that no good American citizen wants to see any legitimate industry in the country injured. Under the hothouse process of the high protective tariff business in the United States has been for many years on an artificial basis. Clearly the makers of the Denver platform recognized this fact. Hence they advocated the reduction of the tariff gradually, so that business could readjust itself to the new order of things.

TARIFF MOTHER OF TRUSTS.

"That the tariff is the mother of trusts there can be no question. Cutting the tariff down to a reasonable basis approximating the revenue standard as nearly as possible will have a very strong tendency to put the trusts out of business, a result which is desired by a very large majority of the American people. The truth is that if they had been honestly and vigorously prosecuted since the enactment of the antitrust law, there would not be a trust in America to-day. The antitrust law should be enforced in all its features. There is no reason why a small criminal should be prosecuted and a great criminal should go scot free. There is no reason why small criminals should be sent to prison and big criminals let off with a fine. When Thomas Jefferson delivered his first inaugural address, which has become a classic, he enunciated the Democratic creed. One proposition in that creed runs in this wise, 'Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political.' Wiser words never fell from human lips, and the Democrats stand pledged, if intrusted with power in all the branches of government, to execute all the laws, including the antitrust law. If that law can not be used to punish all criminals that it is intended to punish, we stand pledged to amend it so that it will reach them all.

TARIFF AND TRUST ISSUES.

"In my judgment, while there are many important questions pending before the American people in one form or another, the tariff question and the cognate question of abolishing the trusts will be the overshadowing issue in the impending campaign. It has been given out in a manner which seems authoritative that President Taft proposes to veto any tariff bills that we pass. We welcome the issue. We do not believe that it can be blinked, postponed, minimized, or shunted out of the way. The present tariff law raises about $330,000,000 a year, which goes into the Treasury of the United States. It is estimated by statisticians that every time $1 goes into Uncle Sam's coffers under the high protective system about $5 goes into the pockets of the tariff barons. If that be true, then the high protective tariff system costs the people of the United States about a billion and a half a year. It is a gross outrage and a cruelty upon the taxpayers of the land. The Democratic theory is and always has been that in adjusting the tariff in order to raise the requisite amount of revenue the highest rates ought to be levied on luxuries and the lowest or none at all on the necessaries of life, and that is precisely the kind of a bill and bills on the tariff which we will pass if we ever get possession of the White House, the House of Representatives, and the Senate all at once.

"Of course, in the short time which I can consume on this occasion it is impossible to give many of the particulars of the enormities and iniquities of the Payne tariff bill. One or two must suffice for the purposes of this address. In this changeable climate blankets and woolen clothing are absolutely necessary to comfort and good health. The rich and the poor alike must have them, and yet on blankets 9 feet long, valued at not over 40 cents per pound, the rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill are 33 cents per pound specific plus 50 per cent of ad valorem. When worked out into ad valorem rates they amounted in 1904 to a tax of 182½ per cent. To make it still plainer, when you go to a store and buy a blanket for $2.82½, $1 is what the blanket is worth, and all that it is worth; the other $1.82½ is what you pay for the poor privilege of paying $1 for a blanket that is only worth $1. To show how nearly prohibitive these rates are, it is only necessary to state that in 1907, the last year for which I have the figures, there was imported into the United States only $40.20 worth of that sort of blankets, on which the Government collected a tariff of $60.53. During that year millions of dollars worth of that sort of blankets were used in the United States—domestic blankets to the value of which was added the tariff, not one cent of which went into the United States Treasury but every cent of which went into the pockets of the tariff barons. Anybody who wants to can vote for that outrageous sort of a law. I will not do it. I will go out of public life forever before I will do it. My public career may be long or it may be short, but whenever I retire or am retired to private life it will be with my own self-respect intact.

"The history of Congress for the last three years demonstrates beyond all cavil that there is no hope of relief from burdensome tariff taxes at the hands of the Republicans. They carried the election of 1908 on the promise to revise the tariff downward. Having gotten in they revised it upward. They revised it up and passed a bill so bad that though the roster of the House showed a Republican majority of 47 we lacked only 5 votes of recommiting it, which would have killed it as dead as the men who lived before the flood. For raising the tariff when they had promised to lower it the Republicans were overthrown in 1910. When in the Sixty-second Congress we passed bills to make moderate reductions in certain schedules the President vetoed them, notwithstanding the fact that he had himself declared that the rates of the woolen schedule were too high and ought to be revised. We took him at his word, and the first tariff bill we passed was the one to scale down the tariff rates of Schedule K. His vetoes demonstrated the fact that he has gone over to the standpatters, bag and baggage. They have absolute control of the party machinery.

"There is no hope of any relief at their hands. How, then, can relief from these tariff burdens which have become intolerable be secured? The only remedy is to elect a Democratic President, a Democratic Senate, and a Democratic House. The newspapers, the magazines, and stump speeches are full of theories and generalizations, but an ounce of performance is worth a ton of theory. I propose to state bluntly and frankly how I believe we can achieve success, which is the great desideratum. The words 'progressive' and 'remedial' as applied to legislation are used interchangeably in popular parlance, and I will so use them here.

"Progress is the law of life. To stand still is to stagnate and to stagnate is to perish.

"Democrats desire progressive legislation. Independents and divers Republicans want it. The majority of the American people favor it. The only way to achieve it is at the hands of the Democrats. The Insurgent Republicans would, no doubt, enact some remedial legislation if they could, but the standpatters are in the majority in that party, and it looks as though they will continue to dominate it indefinitely. It may be for years, and it may be forever. They have control of the Republican machine and they will run it over the Insurgents ruthlessly.

SCANT SHOW FOR INDEPENDENTS.

"The Independents, having no separate party organization, will make their influence felt at the polls by voting for those candidates who appear to most nearly approximate their standard, but as they can entertain no reasonable hope of remedial legislation from the Republican Party so long as it is dominated by the standpatters, it is to be hoped that they will give us their aid and comfort by voting for Democratic candidates this year.

"As the insurgent Republicans can achieve nothing except when working in conjunction with the Democrats, they would most easily and most certainly accomplish their purpose by voting for Democrats all along the line. That is the only chance for the independents and insurgent Republicans to secure progressive or remedial legislation.

"The famous old receipt for cooking a hare applies with peculiar force to those desirous of progressive legislation—first catch your hare. In this exigency first elect a Democratic House, a Democratic Senate, and a Democratic President. That is the sine qua non of progressive or remedial legislation.

"In order to reach this consummation so devoutly to be wished, all those who are opposed to the standpatters and to stand-pat policies must stand together. If they do this, they will triumph together; otherwise they will go down to defeat together.

"We are politically somewhat in the same condition which wise old Ben Franklin described himself and his compatriots to be in when, after signing the Declaration of Independence, he exclaimed, 'Now, we must all hang together or we will all hang separately.'

"Consequently, holding the highest office that any Democrat has held in 15 years, I cordially invite all who desire to remedy existing evils to cooperate with us in our efforts to rescue the Government from the hands of the standpatters.

ISSUE MUST NOT BE BEFOGGED.

"I repeat that, in my judgment, the tariff and the cognate question of the trusts will constitute the overshadowing issues in the coming campaign. The Republicans will undoubtedly undertake to befog these issues and lure us away from the tariff question and the trust question, because they realize the fact that on the tariff question and the trust question we will defeat them most decisively. Of course, there are subsidiary questions of more or less importance, some of them of great importance, but the battle for tariff reform and the destruction of the trusts must be fought to a finish. On these questions we are undoubtedly in the right. We have justice on our side, and on them we should win a sweeping triumph.

"'By their fruits ye shall know them' is a rule established by highest authority. It is grounded in wisdom and in justice. By that rule we are ready to be judged.

"In his speech nominating Gen. Grant for a third term, Roscoe Conkling said 'Gen. Grant's fame rests not only on things spoken and things written but upon the arduous greatness of things done.' That sentence fits the Democrats of Congress like a glove.

"The Republicans seem to be utterly demoralized and split to pieces. The gulf which separates President Taft and his adherents from Col. Roosevelt and his advocates is as deep and wide and impassable as the gulf which separated Dives from Lazarus. Senator La Follette has declared their differences to be fundamental, and fundamental differences can not be reconciled or compromised. It looks as though nothing short of a miracle will reunite them. It is not, however, the part of wisdom for us to rely for success upon their dissensions, for they may accidentally get together.

"That their quarrels, unless composed, will help us there can be no doubt. But our chief reliance for success is to give to the people such a record for honest, intelligent, courageous, constructive, progressive statesmanship as to convince the country beyond the shadow of a doubt that we are worthy of the continued and enlarged confidence of the public. To do this we must lead in the enactment of all remedial legislation. That is our duty to our country and our kind.

"That is the straightest, plainest, shortest, and easiest road to complete success. Pursuing that line of conduct, victory will perch upon our banners whether the Republicans patch up their differences or not. We hold our own fate absolutely in our own hands. Let us not lose our golden opportunity through overconfidence or upon ill-advised reliance upon the quarrels and factional fights among our opponents.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries:
On such a full sea are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures."

Mr. KAHN. Will not the gentleman make it 20 minutes?

Mr. HAYES. I should like five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes and on the next paragraph in 10 minutes. Then gentlemen will get the time they want.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Let us know what the request is. Let the Chair state it so that we will see how the Chair understands it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes and on the next paragraph in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. That is, that only 10 minutes debate be allowed on this paragraph and 10 minutes debate on the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN That is the effect of the request.

Mr. MANN. The effect as first stated would be to close all debate in 10 minutes on both paragraphs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not mean that. I mean that there shall be 10 minutes debate on this paragraph and 10 minutes debate on the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if the Members of this House understand the extent to which our sugar industry has developed in the last 10 years under the influence of the protective tariff. This great increase is a striking example of the results of protection. I have collected a few figures from the Bureau of Statistics which show this phenomenal increase. The years that I have compared are 1901 and 1911. They are as follows:

Domestic production of sugar.

	1901	1911	Increase.	Per cent of increase.
	Tons.	Tons.
Hawaii	247,500	568,000	220,500	63½
Porto Rico	81,500	327,000	245,500	301
Philippines (1908)	51,500	201,000	149,500	290
Continental United States:
Cane sugar	311,887	350,000	38,113	12
Beet sugar	86,082	552,500	476,472	553½
Total domestic	976,992	1,998,000	1,026,008	105

Beet-sugar production in California.

	Tons.
1900	43,370
1910	127,270
Increase	93,900
Per cent of increase	216½

Total consumption of sugar in the United States.

	Tons.
1901	2,750,000
1911	3,835,000
Increase	1,026,008
Per cent of increase	39½

These figures, expressed in short tons, show that cane-sugar production in Hawaii increased from 347,500 tons in 1901 to 568,000 tons in 1911, an increase of 220,500 tons, or 63½ per cent.

In Porto Rico the production in 1901 was 81,500 tons, and in 1911 it was 327,000 tons, an increase of 245,500 tons, or 301 per cent.

In the Philippine Islands, in 1908, the year when the Philippine tariff act went into effect, the production was 51,500 tons. In 1911 it was 201,000 tons, an increase of 149,500 tons, or 290 per cent, in four years.

The cane-sugar industry of Continental United States increased from 311,887 tons in 1901 to 350,000 tons, in round numbers, in 1911, an increase of 38,113 tons, or 12 per cent.

The beet-sugar production of this country in 1901 was 86,082 tons. In 1911 it was 552,500 tons, an increase of 476,472 tons, or 553½ per cent. As we have millions of acres of land adapted to the cultivation of beets, the possible production of beet sugar in this country is almost unlimited.

Our total production of sugar increased from 976,992 tons in 1901 to 1,998,000 tons in 1911, an increase of 1,026,008 tons, or 105 per cent.

If the present conditions were to continue, how long would it take for our production to overtake our consumption of sugar in this country? It seems to be clear that in 10 or 15 years we should be supplying our own demands by the production of sugar in the United States and its Territories and possessions. Our total consumption increased from 2,750,000 tons in 1901 to 3,835,000 tons in 1911, an increase of only 39½ per cent, while the increase in our total domestic production was 105 per cent.

Mr. AUSTIN. How many people are engaged in the cultivation of sugar in this country?

Mr. HAYES. I can not state offhand, but it runs up into the tens of thousands, of course.

In my own district I have three sugar factories in operation, one of which is the largest beet-sugar factory in the world. The production of sugar in California increased from 43,370 tons in 1900 to 127,270 in 1910, an increase of 93,900 tons, or 216½ per cent, although the factories were only increased by 2, 10 being now in operation. Last year the farmers of California were paid $6,000,000 for 1,000,000 tons of beets.

There are now in process of development in California two new beet-sugar factories which, of course, if this legislation is to become a law, will not be built, but must wait until the people of the United States come to the conclusion that it is better for them to produce the sugar that they consume than it is to pay the $100,000,000, which we now annually send out of the country, to the tropical islands or to Germany or France or some other foreign country to buy the sugar which our people consume. The following letter is self-explanatory:

MARYSVILLE, CAL., March 7, 1912.

Hon. E. A. HAYES, Washington, D. C.:

Sutter County is interested in a protective duty upon beet sugar. Before the end of the season, if the duty is retained, the beet-sugar industry there will have assumed large proportions. Outside capital has come to the county and the farmers have in contemplation the planting of a large acreage to beets. The Alameda Sugar Co. is about to begin the construction at Meridian of one of the largest sugar plants in the United States, but it is very doubtful if it will proceed if the duty is removed. I am voicing the wishes of the farming interest in Sacramento Valley in requesting you to use your influence to have the present duty retained.

A. H. HEWITT,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Mr. WILLIS. Some gentleman upon the other side stated in debate yesterday that the German farmer got more for his beets than the American farmer received, and that the American beets had a higher percentage of sugar than the German beets. Can the gentleman give us any information upon that?

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the German farmer receives about $4.50 per ton for his beets; the French farmer a little over $4 per ton for his. Last year the farmers in California received $6 per ton for their beets. The price in this country varies from $5.50 to $7 per ton. The beets in Germany produce about 17½ per cent of sugar; they produced 17.61 per cent in California last year, not enough to account for any considerable part of the difference in the price.

There is another consideration that should appeal strongly to every Member of this House, and that is the highly beneficial effect upon the soil produced by rotating beets with cereal and other crops. It has been demonstrated repeatedly in this country, as well as in Germany and France, that raising on land a crop of beets once in three to five years will increase the crops of cereals in the intervening years fully 100 per cent after a few years of this rotation. A crop of beets is better than fertilizer for this purpose.

And yet, in spite of this fact, the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are willing to put sugar on the free list, when it is perfectly apparent to anyone who gives the subject unbiased consideration that the result must be to stop the growing of beets and to totally destroy one of the great and rapidly growing industries of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. Sugar candy and all confectionery not specially provided for in this act or in the first section of the act cited for amendment, valued at 15 cents per pound or less, and sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 2 cents per pound; valued at more than 15 cents per pound, 25 per cent ad valorem. The weight and the value of the immediate coverings, other than the outer packing case or other covering, shall be included in the dutiable weight and the value of the merchandise.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, when the tariff rate on sugar was raised under the Dingley bill 65 cents per hundredweight the tariff on beets to protect the farmer was under the same bill reduced from 25 per cent ad valorem per ton to 10 per cent ad valorem per ton, thus showing great love for the farmer. Ten per cent ad valorem may be protection enough for the farmer, as there were only some 35,000 tons shipped in here under this rate the past year from the fertile fields of Canada, where they have, according to the report of the Tariff Board, a cheaper average wage than in the United States. We presume those importations will increase from year to year to the satisfaction of the sugar factories. The farmer we hear so much of here is supposed to receive his benefits from the tariff second hand through the 1.95 cents per hundred pounds tariff on the finished product. Mr. Chairman, if the beet-sugar factories of this country were honestly capitalized and only striving to earn a fair return on an honest investment, and could show that they could not do so in competition with foreign countries, I would stand with Members on this side in trying to protect those interests to that extent.

But, Mr. Chairman, the sugar investigation and the speeches of various Members in this House show gross overcapitalization of those industries and that enormous earnings and dividends are being made and paid on not only cane refineries, but on overcapitalized sugar-beet factories throughout the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I think the time has arrived when the Congress of the United States should refuse longer by tariffs to foster and protect any industries the large majority of which are overcapitalized, and who are attempting to make the public pay interest and dividends on the same. Mr. Chairman, I think it is time the ultimate consumer should receive some consideration as well as pampered manufacturers, under the specious plea of protection to the farmers.

Next to flour the most important food element and product known to man is sugar, and it has the most intimate relation with his physical well-being, and I submit that we should treat this universal necessity with the greatest degree of liberality possible.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] in speaking of the production of sugar in the islands of the Hawaiian group made the statement, in substance, that the workmen in the cane fields there were Chinese and Japanese, and that therefore he did not believe the measure of protection that is now afforded should be allowed. As a matter of fact, the number of Chinese and Japanese in the Hawaiian cane fields has been materially reduced within the last two or three years. Chinese coolies are no longer admitted to the islands, and after the experience of the planters during the strike of the Japanese about two years ago the latter were put into the class of undesirable citizens in the Territory. Almost all of the workmen in the cane fields of Hawaii to-day are Caucasians. Twenty dollars a month is the amount of wage that is given to the Orientals, said the gentleman from Iowa. I think that is approximately true. The Caucasians receive at least 50 per cent more than that; but they all receive in addition to the cash wage house rent free, medical attendance free, fuel free, gardens with irrigation ditches and water running through them free. Some of the plantations maintain free nurseries for the children. So that when you figure together the value of these various allowances it makes a much more considerable wage than the gentleman from Iowa indicated.

But what is the condition in regard to the growing of cane sugar in Hawaii? Practically every sugar plantation has to pump millions of gallons of water every day for irrigation purposes. One plantation alone, the Ewa plantation, uses 80,000,000 gallons of water per day in irrigating its plantation. The cost of lifting that amount of water to the surface is no small sum. A number of pumping stations are installed. Their cost is not inconsiderable. In addition to that, the cost of carrying the sugar to the mills in Hawaii is generally much greater than it is in the tropical countries that produce sugar. Many of the plantations were run for years over there before they paid a single cent of dividend, and yet people imagine that the raising of sugar cane in Hawaii is an enormously profitable business. The Olaa plantation near Hilo, on the island of Hawaii, has never to this day paid a dividend, although millions of dollars are invested in the enterprise. So it is with others. There is about one plantation in six that makes any considerable profit on the investment.

The question of labor in Hawaii is a very serious one. It has been difficult to get the right kind of field labor. The producers of sugar in the islands are perfectly willing to pay a proper wage if they can get the right kind of labor; but even at the present time, with the existing duty, they are not able to compete with sugar raised in tropical countries. If the duty be removed, the industry will perish in the islands. Sugar cane planted in the island of Cuba does not have to be replanted for six or seven years. The ratoon crops, as the volunteer crops are called, come up every year for six or seven years. In Hawaii if they get two ratoon crops they are doing very well, indeed. Almost invariably in the fourth year they have to replant, and that is always a very considerable item of expense. Therefore I want to call attention to the fact that the statement made by my friend from Iowa is somewhat misleading as to the cost of production of sugar in the Hawaiian Islands. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Mr. JAMES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will permit the gentleman to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new section, to be numbered section 4, to read as follows:
"SEC. 4. This act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of February, 1913."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the amendment I have proposed is to postpone the operation of this bill, if it should become a law, until February 1, 1913. Mr. Chairman, I assert that as a general rule every Member of this House ought to vote upon a bill exactly as if his vote would either put that law upon the statute book if he voted for it, or mean its defeat if he voted against it. And, Mr. Chairman, I believe that there is a sufficient sense of justice and fair play in the membership of this House that if they would apply that principle to this bill this amendment that I have now proposed would be adopted.

Gentlemen who are familiar with the situation in this country know that contracts have now been made and signed between the beet-sugar manufacturers and the farmers for the crop of this coming year, binding contracts upon the beet-sugar manufacturer that they can under the law be compelled to carry out. Now, gentlemen upon the other side, is it not enough that you penalize the beet-sugar manufacturer by destroying his industry without at the same time making him liable under the law to the farmers of this country for contracts made with them upon the theory and the basis that a reasonable protection would still be accorded him? There was nothing in your platform that declared for free sugar. You did declare for gradual reduction in tariff rates, and I believe that a reduction ought to be made with reference to sugar. But nowhere have you declared for free sugar, and it is not fair, it is not just, it is not equitable, in view of these contracts that are made and existing now to insist that this drastic law that you propose shall immediately go into operation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I must insist on my motion to rise.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have not had an opportunity to discuss this bill or offer an amendment to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is not the right to offer an amendment a preferential motion over a right to rise and report the bill? The gentleman can move to rise at any time, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is a preferential motion, but as the gentleman says he does not care to discuss the amendment, I will call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That six months after the approval of this act if there is not a reduction in the cost of sugar to the consumer equal to the present duty this act shall become void, and the existing duty on sugar shall become effective.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill H. R. 21213 back to the House, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PAYNE moves:
To recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back to the House amended so as to eliminate from the sugar schedule the Dutch standard color test, the differential on refined sugar, provide for a tariff on sugar that shall measure the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and not in conflict with the terms of the treaty with Cuba, such cost of production to be ascertained by scientific investigation and report to be made by the Tariff Board or some similar body.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 200, answered "present" 5, not voting 87, as follows:

There was no objection.
The remarks referred to are as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD BEFORE THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CLUB JANUARY 3, 1912.

"Just as in Alaska natives set up totem poles and worship spirits, and as in the Philippines the nipa huts are tightly closed to keep out the night-flying demons, so most American manufacturers have belonged to a sort of industrial Shut-in Society devoted largely to a cult of fears of things that are not so. Meanwhile, dreading the phantoms without, they have nurtured demons within. They have adopted and cultivated a mental attitude that has sterilized all initiative, and the fear of the ghosts that do not exist has deprived them of the vision to see and deal with the real demons who injure them.

"Two among the ghosts loom large in our industrial horizons. The first of these is called Rate of Wages. Dire evils are laid to his charge. Books have been written about him, and he has filled the mouths of orators in many places and through many years. What he has done to hold back our poor American industries has been vividly told. He is pictured in part as a handicap upon domestic trade, as part of the high cost of living, as the foe of export business, as a general and serious disturber, and to him is charged both the excessive cost of what we buy at home and of what some of us do not sell abroad.

"A second ghost is called Cost of Production. Most of us know very little about this ghost, but we talk of him volubly and tell how bad he is and how he is related by blood and behavior to the first ghost I have named. Men say how hard they have striven to control the influences of this evil spirit, and declare that only protection from some source stronger than themselves will keep them from serious injury at the hands of these phantoms. For phantoms both these ghosts are. Their dreadful names have hung like shadows over many a shop, but men who have faced them boldly have found they are not what they are thought to be; that instead of direful ghosts filled with possibilities of disaster, they are friendly spirits carrying much possibility of good, and offering harm only to those who do not understand how to treat them.

"But the demons within are real, many, and vigorous, four of them especially so. There is one demon called Waste, who is omnipresent. His brother is Ignorance, and they walk hand in hand through many a shop. Closely related is an evil spirit called Neglect, and the fourth member of the devilish group is Blindness. These baneful four are no dreams, but real destroyers. It is against them that protection is needed. Those strong men among our industries who have learned that the Rate of Wages is a friendly spirit have found him powerful also in overcoming the demon called Waste, and just as with clear minds and fixed purpose they study into the true nature of the Rate of Wages and the Cost of Production do the demons of Neglect, Ignorance, and Blindness cease to trouble.

"In this brief preface I have tried to sketch the fundamentals of our industrial problem as it relates to the tariff. We have been too long ghost fearers and devil conservers. Let us face about, look firmly at the ghosts and squarely at the devils. The ghosts will be found helpful friends and the devils—

"Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
And silently steal away."

"American manufacturers need tariff reform for certain definite, specific purposes. Among these are:
"1. To enlarge their mental and moral vision.
"2. To increase their efficiency.
"3. To teach them the gospel of self-help.
"I am tempted to add a fourth reason—to get rid of ghosts; but when the vision mental and moral shall have been enlarged and efficiency shall have been learned and self-help acquired, the ghosts will have gone.

"Our manufacturers need to have their mental vision enlarged, because ignorance is a limiting factor. It has always been true that 'a little knowledge is a dangerous thing.' They have been fed on untruths. It is not true, for example, that because a man is paid $3 per day his product necessarily costs more than that of a man paid $2 per day. It is not true that goods cost so much of necessity in an American shop that they can not meet foreign competition. It is not true that our industries would be injured, much less destroyed, by a reduction of the tariff wall. It is more true, far, that this very tariff wall is in danger of creating a sort of industrial "Paresis club." It is true that product is a far more important thing in cost than the rate of wage. It is true that direct labor cost is a small part of the total cost of making goods. It is true that the burden charge is often heavier than the direct labor charge; it is true that the selling expense is often heavier than the direct labor charge; it is true that when comparison is made between the rate of wage in America and the rate of wage abroad, such a comparison is meaningless and silly unless the rate of production and its conditions be stated. It is true that when the difference between the rate of wage at home and abroad is given it is a difference which relates to but a small part of the cost of making goods, and in no sense a major part. For example, if the somewhat mysterious synopsis of the report of the Tariff Board may be quoted, there is said to be a difference in labor cost in making yarn between England and the United States of 100 per cent; but this 100 per cent does not sound so large, even if it be always true, which I doubt, when the report shows that the total proportion of labor cost in making yarn is but 9¼ per cent, and the 100 per cent difference, therefore, is but a difference of 4⅝ per cent of the total cost of the yarn. Other plain truths are: The differences in cost between two American concerns in the same line are often greater than the difference in cost between a concern abroad and one at home in the same line. The difference in direct labor cost between a foreign and a domestic concern in the same line may be entirely overcome by differences in the burden charge.

"I am told, and believe it to be true, that but few American manufacturers really know the cost of their goods, and but very few the cost of each operation in making their goods. An examiner for the Tariff Board told me that in 16 shops he visited they did not know what their goods cost and had no systematic, accurate way of finding out. One of the first and most beneficial results of the removal of artificial protection would be to make our manufacturers learn these facts, to enlarge their mental vision along the line of the old Jewish proverb, 'Physician, heal thyself.'

"But there would be a moral enlargement of vision also, for among our industrial shut-ins strange moral growths occur. For example, what think you of men in control of a large industry buying for their personal gain other factories whose product must be used by the larger one and then arranging to have the output of the one they own purchased at high prices by the other which they control? What think you of concerns employing men at large salaries whose duty in large part it is to copy as nearly as they dare patents having value which are submitted to them for purchase or of which they learn in order that they may themselves benefit by the inventor's skill without his profiting by it? Or what is your view of their using a department of patent law to protect them against the righteous claims of those whose property they have taken, and what of the morals of a large concern telling a small one that unless they cease suing them for the misuse of patents the little will be driven out of business by the big? Under the genial influence of a reduction of duties some of these processes would become too expensive and legitimate competition would at least offer a larger field for dealing with those whose sense of honor was higher and would open a broader market to the inventor.

"A reduction of tariff would increase the efficiency of the American manufacturer and therefore add to the profits of his business. The fetish of having to cut wages to keep cost down is dead or dying. Even the Tariff Board admits that. It is output that counts. An experienced manufacturer said to me a few days ago: 'The tariff kills initiative and raises the cost.' You have no doubt noticed that the cry as to the inefficiency of their labor comes from those industries that are most highly protected. Provide a profitable market for a manufacturer and why should he spur himself. Like the rest of us he will be as lazy as he dares, and if through the grace of law he may sell, as our wool men are said by the Tariff Board to do, at prices 67 per cent higher than those prevailing abroad, why should he strive to improve himself so long as it pays not to do so? While obsessed with the belief that high wages mean high labor cost and imbued with a conviction of his own helplessness, how can a man become efficient? For efficiency means keen self-criticism. It means to go out into the shop and find nothing there that is sacred or fixed. It means that in that shop six months ago shall be ancient history. It means the dropping of tradition, the forgetting of ghosts, the questioning of everything. It means the old Scripture doctrine, 'Prove all things, hold fast that which is good,' and only that. This means serious, constant, patient study and toil, and it needs a spur to bring men to that labor. True, the men with vision in our industries, who have the sense of the industrial seer, and especially in those industries which have been less protected from the ghosts by law, have done this labor and have found it amazingly lucrative. Here note one vital but not obvious fact. What of the concerns whose names do not appear in our tariff fights.

"Has anyone thought to make a list of the houses that are silent on the tariff? Has it occurred to anyone that a reason for this silence may be that some of these houses feel so competent to meet any tariff situation that they are fearless about it? I have the best of reasons for thinking this is true of two large worsted manufacturers, and I know it is true of other concerns. They do not care to advertise the fact that by keener management, finer equipment, and better methods they are doing so well that the tariff is to them an indifferent thing, because, so to speak, they would put their competitors "onto the game." Look among the names of the manufacturers in our great industries who do not make Washington their Mecca and see what you find. Tariff reduction will bring to the American manufacturer everywhere that spur from legitimate competition which will make him criticize and study his own methods, which will force him to drive out the devils of ignorance, waste, neglect, and blindness.

"And with a larger and purer vision, and with higher efficiency, he will have gone far on the road to the third gain from tariff reduction, namely, he will have begun to learn self-help. And to substitute self-help for dependence, courage for fear, hope for doubt, manliness for cowardice, is the noble task in which the Democratic Party is engaged in its campaign for tariff reform. But self-help means more than anything we have yet said. It means, after doing all we have suggested, stopping the greatest waste in industry and utilizing the greatest force in industry, which waste is now sadly great and which force is too little used.

"Look at the elements in the cost of production—material, that is an inert, dead thing; selling expense, that produces nothing; burden charge, truly described by its name of a burden; labor cost, here you have the one productive element. Is it treated productively? Your building, your machinery, your material, these are investments. Your men—are their wages an investment or an expense? Look at the question squarely. Your whole industrial efficiency rests on the answer.

"If the wages of these men are an expense, then the less of it the better. If your men are an expense, then cutting wages becomes normal and proper. They rank like waste of any kind. They are a thing to be reduced to the lowest limit if you think that pays. But if the wages of these men are an investment, if this one productive element in industry has in the very fact of its productiveness something that separates it from all other kinds of cost, then it is worth conserving. For your investments you cultivate, you develop, you improve, you study their nature, you are deeply interested in their management, you wish them to be efficient, helpful, reliable, steady. Indeed, you look for a growing return from them. It pays to study investments. It does not pay to treat an investment contrary to the laws of the thing in which you invest. It is better, cheaper, more profitable to work with the laws of your investment than against its laws. Self-help means a new outlook on labor for a manufacturer. It means that he has got to cease to profit by it and learn to profit with it. It means that the pay roll is an investment and not an expense, and a chasm of thought divides the two. It means that the old ghost of the rate of wages has turned into a friendly spirit that says to him, 'The more I grow, the larger I am, the more I should produce for you and yours'; and it says to the cost of production, 'The more I produce the smaller you get and the less influence you have.' It says to the man whose vision has been enlarged, 'Do not worry about your rate of wages; think, rather, of your rate of output; get rid of the devil of waste, stop the devil of neglect of your burden charges and blindness to the inefficiency of your equipment and ignorance of your handling expense. Drive out the devil of neglect of your own costs and blindness to your selling charges. Get rid of the things that don't produce and make the most, the utmost, of the one element in your shop that does produce, and above all things do nothing in blindness, ignorance, or neglect, or waste to cramp or antagonize or hamper the only productive element, the only responsive element in the cost of the goods you make.' And so the Democratic position is one that is not negative but affirmative, it is not destructive but constructive, it is in line with all the forces of uplift in our land. It is the gospel of hope and not of doubt, the gospel of courage and not of fear, the gospel of moderation and not of rashness, it is the teaching of that same self-help to our manufacturers which we try to cultivate in our children. It does not let 'I dare not wait upon I would,' but says 'you can.' It is the teaching of industrial freedom, a strong and not a weak faith.

"Let me close with the statement of certain truths which form at least a part of the Democratic declaration of industrial independence and which the Democratic Party believes to be evident.

"There is in the strict sense of language no such thing as the cost (meaning the fixed cost) of production, and the phrase as often used misleads.

"Since there is and can be no such thing as a fixed or uniform cost of producing an article, to base a fixed tax thereon is absurd and impossible.

"The nature of cost being variable, a tax actually based on such differences between cost in Europe and America as might be found to exist would vary constantly. If based on the cost records of an inefficient American shop it might at times be high; if based on best American practice it might not exist at all.

"The difference in cost between American shops in the same industry are as great as or greater than the average differences in cost between America and Europe. The same is to a degree true in each industry of Europe. The relations of these costs each to the other both within and without any industrial country constantly change. The statements, therefore, seriously made by some about basing a tariff on the differences in labor cost between this country and Europe are ridiculous. It would involve preferences in favor of one European country as against another, and if it were to be maintained at the actual differences in cost, it would have to be adjusted frequently to meet changes in efficiency, methods, or invention in the various countries affected by it.

"A tariff based on the difference in the cost of production must, if it be correct, be a different tariff against every country producing like goods for costs in these countries vary. Not only so, but logic requires that a separate tariff be made against separate factories in so far as their costs differ.

"A tariff based on differences in cost of production is a logical and industrial absurdity.

"It is a normal thing that the most highly protected industries should be the most backward.

"The cost of labor is but a minor part of total cost and rarely the controlling element therein.

"The differences in wages between America and Europe affect but a small part of the total cost of manufacture, and is itself so modified by many other conditions affecting cost as to be valueless as a basis for argument.

"The chief controlling factor in production is the rate of output. Other factors therein are burden charge, selling expense, material cost, and lastly, and often least, labor cost. It may therefore pay, often does pay, to increase the wage rate to induce output and therefore to reduce the relative burden and selling charge.

"The reduction of the wage rate as a means of economy is the foolish resort of the inefficient and the ill-informed.

"Differences in cost may have no relation to labor. In A's shop where total cost is least, labor cost may be most. In B's shop where total cost is greatest, labor cost may be least.

"The possible saving in total cost through eliminating the element of waste in its many forms may amount to one-half even while the daily rate of wage will increase. Under these conditions, despite the increase in wage, the output may so enlarge that profits would be greatly increased even though selling prices were reduced to meet competition.

"The Republican Party undertakes to insure 'a reasonable profit' by law. A reasonable profit has never been defined nor its conditions made known. Such a profit may vary, that being reasonable in one place being unreasonable in another; that which is fair under some conditions would be unfair under others; that which is righteous in some industries would be unrighteous in others; that which is normal in some places, abnormal in others. What are the limits? Who is to decide what a reasonable profit is?

"The Democratic Party believes that the policy of a tariff for revenue only is not only a policy free from the logical absurdities of a tariff based upon the alleged cost of production, but that it is a policy which opens to our industries the way to development on normal and permanent lines where brains, character, and energy may work out their natural results to the profit of the manufacturer, to the advantage of the worker, and to the gain of the consumer.

"The Democratic Party would substitute industrial self-help for tarif protection. By this it does not mean rash, hasty, or even radical removals of existing duties, but reducing them with moderation to a revenue basis. By self-help it means that our manufacturers shall exercise that constant and searching self-criticism into their own plans, methods, and management, which should mark every progressive producer, but which is little likely to exist, and has in many cases not existed, whereas by reason of the tariff a profit has been assured by law. But self-help in industry means more than this. It means replacing doubt with hope and fear with courage. Protection is the gospel of security for the incompetent and inefficient at the national cost. Self-help is the gospel of competence and efficiency to the general gain. But self-help means yet more. It means an altered attitude on the part of manufacturers toward labor. It means the spirit of cooperation between employer and his workman. It means a recognition of the law that a well-paid and well-treated employee is the cheapest producer. It means a true industrial democracy in which owner, workmen, and consumer pull together with greater profit to the first, larger wages with shorter hours and less strenuous labor for the second, and lower prices for the third. This is the aim and the outcome of industrial self-help. It is a teaching opposed to all narrow selfishness, hostile to much of our accepted business economy, but it is in fundamental accord with the laws of human nature and with enlightened self-interest on the part of all dependent on our industries."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to call up the excise tax bill (H. R. 21214) to-morrow morning. I would like to make an arrangement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], if I can do so, about the consideration of that bill.

Mr. PAYNE. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time does the gentleman think will be required for general debate on the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. There is not so much pressure for debate on that bill as there was on this. A good many gentlemen who wanted to speak on this bill, 20 or more, have taken five minutes and obtained leave to print. Now, I do not know whether some of these gentlemen will come in and want to speak in the open House on the income-tax bill or not. The gentleman will excuse me for not falling into his terms. There are only four or five gentlemen who have indicated to me as yet a desire to speak on that bill.

Mr. MANN. Why not let that remain unsettled and make the other suggestion which the gentleman has in mind, which will give us an opportunity to ascertain better how many gentlemen desire to speak.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My only purpose in making this suggestion at this time is that to-morrow being Saturday, if we can let the general debate run over until Monday that would enable some gentlemen to go home over Sunday. That is my purpose in making the request. I would say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that if it is satisfactory to him, and we can arrange to do so, I will be willing to agree to have general debate on this bill to-morrow and Monday, and take it up under the five-minute rule immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday, if we can agree to put Monday's business over until Thursday.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that arrangement would be satisfactory, but why not make that request without fixing the absolute time for general debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, I ask unanimous consent that the business for next Monday, which is suspension day, be transferred to Thursday, so that the excise bill may be considered on Monday as well as on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that business in order, under the rule, for next Monday be transferred to Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 16, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1. I observe that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is now present, and he gave notice that he would desire to speak on the bill immediately after the close of the morning business.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from North Dakota will withhold his motion for one moment, I will state that on yesterday the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] offered a resolution which I asked might go over. I have examined it and see no objection to it. I presume the Senator from Tennessee may want to have it considered.

Mr. LEA. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. I withhold my motion until the resolution is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Tennessee.

Senate resolution 250, submitted yesterday by Mr. LEA, was read and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas it is reported that there is pending before the Department of Justice a settlement between the United States and the International Harvester Co., by which the so-called Harvester Trust may be permitted to reorganize and to bring its organization and business within the Sherman antitrust law as construed by the Supreme Court: Be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to lay before the Senate all correspondence and information he may have upon this subject, together with any and all correspondence, information, and reports of the Bureau of Corporations relating thereto, from January 1, 1904, to the present time.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 21213. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I renew my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I rise to speak in favor of a pension bill that will settle the pension question for all time to come; that will forever put an end to special pension legislation; that will, when once put into operation, enable the Government to dispense with the services of thousands of examiners and special agents, spies and detectives—a measure which has the support of the great majority of the soldiers of the Nation who served in the ranks of the Union Army as privates during the Civil War and who by the thousand are registering their protest against the McCumber or Smoot substitute now under consideration.

Mr. President, the last Democratic State convention of Indiana, held on April 28, 1910, was made up of more than 1,500 delegates representing every township in each of the 92 counties of the State. By a unanimous vote it adopted a platform of principles in which it pledged the honor of the party that the candidates that day nominated should, if successful, carry out and perform, in so far as they were able, the promises therein made. One of those platform declarations was as follows:

We favor the immediate enactment of a pension law by Congress providing for a pension of not less than $1 a day for all Union veterans of the Civil War.

Mr. President, that convention also, by a unanimous vote, nominated me as the party's candidate for the position I now hold. I accepted that nomination, fully advised as to the declaration of principles theretofore made by the convention, and without hesitation or mental reservation agreed that, if elected, I would honestly and faithfully do what I could to carry out my party promises.

That convention was not made up of mere politicians, but was composed for the most part of earnest, serious-minded men from every walk of life, who for the time had left the plow, the anvil, the shop, the office, and the store and assembled to declare their political faith, to express themselves upon public questions, and as patriotic citizens organize their party for the contest for better government and more equal and beneficial laws.

The platform declaration for a dollar-a-day pension was not made as a mere empty promise to catch votes—a promise to be ignored and violated in the event of party success, but an expression of the conscientious conviction of that great body of men that such legislation as that promised was justly due to the survivors of the war not only as a mark of gratitude, but as an act of plain and simple justice to the men who in time of national stress and peril had proved their love of country by offering their lives in its defense.

It was in line with the promise of "generous pensions" made in the last Democratic national platform adopted at Denver in 1908 and with the promises made in the platforms of all political parties since the commencement of the Civil War.

Every delegate in that Indiana State convention at the time he cast his vote for that platform declaration had in mind scores of his neighbors who had served their country in the hour of its distress now grown so old and infirm as to be unable to win bread by their labor and anxious and distressed because of their inability to provide for their necessities.

They knew that the pensions of eight, twelve, and even twenty dollars per month doled out by the Government with sparing and cautious hand to these veterans were utterly inadequate to provide for their actual wants, and recognizing, on the one hand, the great value of the services of these men to their country, and, on the other hand, the vast wealth and great ability of the Nation to deal generously with its defenders, could see no reason why the few remaining years of these men should not be made at least tolerable by granting their request for a pension of a dollar a day.

The Republican State platform of the same year declared with the same unanimity that "we believe the time has come for the enactment of what is known as a dollar-a-day pension plan for the relief of the necessities of Civil War veterans."

It will be seen that in the great central State of Indiana, which contributes its full share of taxes toward the support of the National Government, there is absolute unanimity of sentiment on the question of full and ample justice to the veterans of the Civil War, so that in advocating the Sherwood pension bill here I am representing no party nor faction of a party but the whole people of a great Commonwealth, who, without regard to political differences, demand that the obligations of the Government to its defenders be fully, amply, and generously discharged.

And yet, Mr. President, our people are in favor of economical government, and unalterably opposed to extravagant and needless appropriations of the moneys collected from them by any form of Federal or State taxation. But in Indiana we do not regard any appropriation as extravagant which is necessary to maintain the honor of the State or to discharge its honest obligations.

It has sometimes happened that the burdens of taxation became onerous and oppressive when appropriations were necessary for the payment of our State indebtedness and the interest thereon; but when it was known that the honor of the State was involved there was no murmur of discontent, and no man thought of charging extravagance to the legislature making the appropriation.

Then, again, the taxes levied for the purpose of providing for the care and education of our unfortunate people—the blind, the deaf and dumb, the soldiers' orphans, and others of that class—that their lives might be brightened a little, seemed heavy and burdensome, but they were paid cheerfully, because the common instincts of humanity required it.

And so here, whether the claim of the old soldiers rests upon the contract obligation of the Government or upon the ground of gratitude and common humanity, our people can never be brought to the belief that there can be extravagance in any appropriation of public moneys for the purpose of providing for the necessities of the old men whose services in that great War between the States made disunion impossible and the Union perpetual, and made possible that great development of the material resources of our country which has made us the richest and most powerful of all the nations of the earth.

AN OBLIGATION OF HONOR.

Measured by its dealings with other creditors, this Government has utterly failed to carry out the plain provisions of its contract with the soldiers of the Civil War.

The armies of the Union were made up almost entirely of poor men. Business men, as a rule, remained at home and made money while clerks and employees went to war. Men who owned farms, especially those who owned large farms, operated them with great profit throughout the struggle, while the tenants and farm hands were urged to volunteer. Great fortunes were made by many of those who took no part in the conflict, for the necessities of the Government were great and the opportunities for making money unparalleled. Contractors for supplies of every kind waxed fat, and the manufacturers who were subject to war taxes were given special tariff legislation, enacted for the avowed purpose of offsetting the amounts paid by them for the support of the Government, but for the real purpose of enriching them at the expense of the people.

The Government promised to pay the soldiers $13 per month, which was afterwards increased to $16. The contract was to pay them in dollars. They were paid in currency so depreciated as to be worth on the average less than 50 cents on the dollar, so that instead of receiving the contract price of $13 and $16, they actually received from about $6 to $7 per month. Prices for the necessaries of life were correspondingly high, and as a result the families of the soldiers in many instances were supported largely by public and private charity.

Sir, we heard much in a recent campaign about 50-cent dollars and the infamy of a government that would discharge a contract obligation calling for the payment of dollars with money worth only 50 cents on the dollar. The mere prospect or prophecy that Government creditors would be compelled to receive silver dollars in payment of their claims stirred the financiers of the Nation into frenzied action, and resulted in a great crusade in behalf of the national honor, which was at once grotesque and tragic. On every stump and through the great newspapers it was declared that the payment of a just debt in depreciated money was the acme of national perfidy.

Yet to-day these same financiers, with the same earnestness and zeal with which they shouted for national honor in 1896, are denouncing as a raid on the Treasury a proposition to pay to old soldiers who saved their country for them the pittance of a dollar a day, that they may have food and shelter in their old age, and that some measure of justice be done them because in those dreadful days of civil war they were paid dollars worth less than 50 cents for their heroic work.

Mr. President, during and at the close of that war there were two general classes of Government creditors—the holders of the Government bonds and the men who had given up the best part of their lives on the march, in camp, in prison, and in battle for the restoration of the Union. The first class had remained at home engaged in the pleasant pursuit of money making, while the second class had endured during all those long years all the privations incident to the greatest war of modern times. The bonds issued by the Government were, for the most part, bought with greenbacks. The bonded debt of $2,049,975,700 cost the purchasers of the bonds at the time they were issued only $1,371,424,238 in money of gold value, the kind of money in which they were paid. There was no question but that the bonds for which greenbacks were paid were payable in the lawful money of the country.

John Sherman so held, and the Republican Party of Indiana, then led by Oliver P. Morton, so declared in its State platform in 1868. And yet, sir, the Government was so jealous of its honor that in March, 1869, by the famous coin act, all such bonds were made payable in coin, thereby giving to the bondholders a clear profit of more than $678,000,000—a naked speculation—something for nothing.

When, a little later, a measure was offered in Congress to protect the national honor by paying to the soldiers the difference between the amounts which the Government agreed to pay them and the amounts actually received by them from the Government, it failed of a respectful hearing, its author being denounced as a demagogue for bringing a proposition so preposterous into the halls of national legislation.

Mr. President, I now call upon all those men who were so solicitous for the national honor in 1896, and whose consciences were so quickened at the mere prophecy of 50-cent dollars, to rally to the support of the Sherwood pension bill to the end that the old soldiers of the Union who made hundred-cent dollars, or dollars of any kind, possible in this country, and who were paid for their gallant services in 40-cent dollars, may have before they die some measure of justice at the hands of a Government penitent for its one act of debt repudiation.

TOO LATE FOR DISCRIMINATION.

It was in June, 1825—mark the date, for it is important—that the cornerstone of the Bunker Hill Monument was laid. The ceremonies were so impressive and imposing that the event has been ever since regarded as one of the most notable in our history. La Fayette, flushed with such a series of welcomes never before or since accorded to any foreigner coming to these shores, was there, the guest of the Nation, participating in the ceremonies. A vast concourse of patriotic people had assembled. The wealth and the learning of New England were present, and so it seemed were all the people. But the seats of honor were occupied by the old survivors of the revolution, the men who had followed Washington and his generals in that war for independence, and some of whom had witnessed with swelling hearts the surrender of Cornwallis. Daniel Webster was the orator of the day. The day, the place, the occasion, the audience, the surroundings! What inspiration for the greatest of all American orators! And Webster rose grandly to the occasion and delivered an oration that will live as long as men and women who love liberty read our language. Who has read his words addressed directly to the venerable men of the revolution, recounting their sacrifices in the cause of liberty, and expressing the everlasting gratitude of the beneficiaries of their valorous deeds, without such emotions as bring the tears unbidden to the eyes?

And the sentiments he expressed touched a responsive chord in every heart in that great audience and in all the land. For these were the men who had offered their lives to the end that this people might be free, and had made possible all the blessings which, under a republican form of government, they enjoyed—the blessings which under the providence of God will be enjoyed by the countless generations which follow them.

Did Webster on that historic day in that hallowed place stop to draw a line of distinction between the old gray-haired veterans, who sat with streaming eyes looking into his face as there poured from his lips those eloquent words of tribute to their valor and sacrifice? There were before him men who had served throughout those seven dreadful years of war. Others there were who, too young for battle at the beginning, had joined the army only a year or perhaps a month before the end at Yorktown. Some had rendered service as scouts on the frontier without participating in important engagements. Doubtless some had been braver than others and had borne more willingly the burdens and dangers of battle. Was reference made to that? No, no; the war had ended 42 years before. It was too late for discrimination then. The time had long gone by for nice discriminations. Webster only saw—the people only recognized this body of survivors in the mass—rapidly diminishing, year by year as death called, and, before it might be too late, all sought to do honor to all lest discrimination might work injustice to some.

Who was there on that historic occasion to sound a note of discord by protesting against the tribute of the great orator because it was paid to all of the survivors? Who, on that great occasion, had it in his heart to say, "No, Webster, you are mistaken. In the rapidly thinning ranks of these old gray-haired soldiers there are men who faltered in the hour of danger—men who served only months instead of years—men who do not deserve to be honored by this people." There was no such thought in any mind, and the harmony of the occasion was not marred by such utterance, and no old soldier who heard that great oration returned to his home that day heavy of heart because of any intimation that he was less deserving than his comrades who had served longer or even better.

Mr. President, the great war for the preservation of the Union ended 47 years ago. The average age of the survivors of the Army of the Republic is five years greater than the average age of the Revolutionary heroes who, at Bunker Hill in June, 1825, heard Webster deliver his immortal utterances.

Almost half a century has elapsed since the armies of Grant and Sherman marched down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, passing in grand review before the dignitaries of the Nation.

In those great armies on that day there was every grade of soldier—heroes of an hundred battles and striplings who had, for lack of opportunity, only participated in two or three or perhaps only one. In those ranks were men of sublime courage and others weakened by disease and privation, who did not possess great physical courage. Some had served from Bull Run to Appomattox and others whose service was shorter and of less value, but beneath every blue uniform there beat a patriotic heart, and each in his way and according to his opportunty had served his country and rendered some service in restoring the Union and maintaining the honor of the old flag.

On that proud day of review, in May, 1865, the men of that army were in the vigor of young manhood, full of joy that their efforts for the Union had been crowned with success—full of hope for the future of the Republic for which they had sacrificed so much. Laying aside arms and uniform they returned to the peaceful walks of life and took upon themselves the duties of citizenship.

Forty-seven years have rolled by. Within that time hundreds of thousands of those brave men have answered their last roll call and have been called to their reward. Each day witnesses the final departure of many, and the ranks of the survivors are in this way being broken day by day. Those who remain are bowed beneath the weight of years, for nearly all have reached or passed man's allotted span of three score and ten.

A few years more and the grandest army the world ever saw will have disappeared, and the men who, at Gettysburg, and Antietam, and Chancellorsville, and Lookout, won imperishable glory for themselves and their country will live only in the memories of the younger generations, who will in the years to come enjoy the blessings of a free Government which these old men periled life to maintain.

Mr. President, these venerable soldiers of the Union to whom we owe so much of our greatness and prosperity make no unreasonable demands, for they only demand that the plighted faith of the Nation be kept and that they have just treatment.

In this age of luxury they demand no luxuries, nor do they ask to be indulged in any extravagant tastes. They only ask that out of our abundance they be allowed a sum which will provide humble homes, beds on which to rest and to die, raiment that will protect their aged bodies from the cold, and food sufficient to sustain them in their declining years.

Who will grudge these old veterans a dollar a day? Their days for earning money are past. The road to the grave is a short one.

And the men in or out of Congress who go about with microscope peering into the individual records of the few, to discover a defect here and there—the men on the hunt for excuses to justify them in refusing justice to the great mass, will not command more attention than would a man at Bunker Hill who had tried to break the force of the great oration by reading records showing that a few of the old Revolutionary soldiers before him were unworthy of the tribute which Webster had paid to all.

Sir, in the county in which I was born and reared there was a solitary grave near the roadside, said to have been that of a soldier of the Revolution who had died in the early pioneer days of that county. I remember the veneration in which that grave was held by me and my youthful associates. The question as to whether he had served months or years, whether he had been the best soldier or the worst, never entered our minds. We only remembered that he had worn the uniform of the Continental Army and had contributed something to the cause of American liberty.

Mr. President, I grant freely that there was a time when discrimination would have been proper. During the years immediately following the conflict when the first pension legislation was being enacted for the benefit of the Civil War veterans the pensions should have been graded according to the length and character of service, the extent of disability, and the pecuniary condition of the applicant. The incidents of the war were then fresh in the minds of all and little difficulty would have been experienced in ascertaining the true record of every soldier.

But after the lapse of a half century it is too late. We now can only deal with this rapidy disappearing army as a mass. We can only remember that they wore the uniform and that all did something for the preservation of this matchless governmental fabric. We only see the bent and tottering forms and realize that many of them are in distress, approaching their near-by graves with hearts made heavy by a Nation's neglect. And then we recall the promises that were made in the hour of national stress and storm to induce them to leave their homes and peril their lives and sacrifice health to the end that the Nation might not perish from the earth, not forgetting the pledge of the Nation made by the immortal Lincoln in his second inaugural address, delivered a month before the fall of Richmond and five weeks before his tragic death, that we would "bind up the Nation's wounds and care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and orphan."

Mr. President, let there be no more delay in caring for those who bore the battle, their widows and orphans. If we have not the desire as patriots to do so, let us as a Christian people have compassion upon them, because they need the Nation's comforting aid.

THE PROPOSED SUBSTITUTE.

Sir, I am opposed to the pending bill, known as the McCumber or Smoot substitute, because it does not meet the just demands of the Union soldiers.

Under its provisions but a few thousand of the surviving veterans could ever receive a dollar a day, and it is so full of inequalities and unjust discrimination that it has received unstinted condemnation at the hands of the soldiers of the country. I desire to quote from Gen. SHERWOOD, chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee of the House of Representatives, a gallant soldier, who enlisted as a private in April, 1861, participated in 42 battles, and mustered out as a brigadier general, having been promoted to that position by President Lincoln for long and faithful service and conspicuous gallantry at the battles of Resaca, Franklin, and Nashville, a record which entitles his words to consideration. He says:

First, let me call your attention to the fact that no soldier out of the 600,000 called out by President Lincoln in 1862 will ever be able to get the maximum pension of $30 per month under the Smoot substitute should he live to be 100 years old. According to the official roster of the War Office, 421,465 men were mustered into the service under Lincoln's call of July 2, 1862, for 300,000 men. Under the call of August 4, 1862, for 300,000 men 87,588 were furnished; 15,000 militia were called out in May and June, making a total of volunteers furnished in 1862 of 522,053. Of this number 421,465 were mustered into the service for three years—none of them so mustered in until August, 1862. The war closed in April, 1865. All of these regiments were mustered out before they had served three years. Hence, not a man of any of these veteran regiments that fought the greatest and fiercest battles of the bloodiest war in all history could ever get a dollar-a-day pension under the Smoot substitute bill should he live to be 100 years old. * * * I do not believe that over 9,000 soldiers out of the over 511,000 now living would ever be able to draw the maximum pension of $30 per month under this substitute bill.

Let me illustrate the Smoot substitute: It proposes to pension a 90-day man who is 75 years old at $21 per month, while a veteran of 40 battles who enlisted in 1862 at the age of 16 years only gets $15.50 per month, because he was mustered out a few months short of three years on account of the close of the war. The Smoot substitute pensions a 90-day man of 70 years at $18 per month, while a 3-year veteran who served in 36 of the signal battles of the war and is now less than 66 years old and who has a service record at the front of 3½ years with a veteran reenlistment only gets $18 per month.

Let me further illustrate: Here is Samuel Barnhart, Forty-sixth Ohio, who enlisted in 1862, when 16 years old, for three years, and served in 20 battles, mustered out June 4, 1865.

Here is another soldier, David Gillespie, One hundred and seventy-seventh Ohio, who enlisted for 100 days, in August, 1864, at the age of 28 years.

Barnhart is now 65 years old, and under the Smoot substitute would draw a pension of $15.50 per month, while Gillespie, the 100-day soldier, who is now 75 years old, would draw $21 per month.

Here is another specimen: George W. Davis was mustered in Company A, One hundred and thirty-first Ohio, a 100-day regiment, at the age of 27. James C. Reiber, same company, enlisted at 16 years. Davis is now 75 years old and under the Smoot substitute would receive $21 per month, while Reiber, who is now 64, would get only $13 per month. Both rendered the same service and touched elbows in the same company.

He also calls attention to the fact, which must not be overlooked, that the Smoot substitute has no disability clause, and that it contains no provision which will put a stop to the ever-increasing number of private pension bills of which so much complaint has been made upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I favor House bill No. 1—the Sherwood bill—because it is the nearest approach to a dollar-a-day pension that is attainable and because it settles once and for all this much-mooted pension question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the language of the Sherwood bill. The soldier with a service of less than six months gets but $15 per month, and under the bill, no matter how long he lives, he does not get an increase. Under the substitute proposed by me he does get an increase, and if he lives to be 75 years of age he gets the full $30 per month.

Mr. KERN. Provided he served a certain length of time.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; a certain length of time.

Mr. KERN. How long?

Mr. KENYON. Three years.

Mr. SMOOT. Three years.

Mr. KERN. That is the point I was making here.

Mr. SMOOT. But under the substitute if he served only 90 days as his age increases so does his pension increase. In other words, a 90-day man 62 years old gets $12, a 90-day man at 66 gets $15, a 90-day man at 70 gets $18, and a 90-day man at 75 gets $21.

Mr. KERN. No matter what his disabilities may be, whereas under the Sherwood bill——

Mr. SMOOT. No matter what his disabilities are?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. But wherever there are disabilities the present law provides for them, and special acts have always been passed providing for disabilities such as spoken of by the Senator.

Mr. KERN. We are trying to get away from special pension legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. In my opinion, we never will get away from it, and so far as I personally am concerned I want to say this——

Mr. KERN. I yielded for a question. If the remarks are not too long, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield further?

Mr. KERN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. When an old soldier has arrived at a point where he is utterly helpless and has no means of providing for himself or those dependent upon him, I believe he ought to be taken care of by special pension bill, and I shall always vote for it under such circumstances.

Mr. KERN. There is a radical difference between the Senator and myself on that proposition. I want a pension bill passed now that will settle the pension question for all time to come, and which will make no longer necessary special pension legislation. That I believe——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. I do not yield to the Senator to reply to my speech now, but I will yield for a question. The Senator must remember this is my first speech——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a question, then. Do I understand the Senator to mean that if the Sherwood bill becomes a law that a soldier who served less than six months is never to receive more than $15?

Mr. KERN. Under the Sherwood bill, as I understand it, the total disability of a soldier gives him $30 a month, if he served six months.

Mr. SMOOT. Or if wounded in battle.

Mr. KERN. If wounded in battle or if he served more than six months.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is wrong there. Or unless the disability is of service origin.

Mr. KERN. I have not time to stop and discuss the bill. Senators can read the bill. It speaks for itself.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not further take the time of the Senator from Indiana. As he says, the bill speaks for itself.

Mr. KERN. The purpose of the bill is to determine automatically the status of every soldier in the country, and then we will have no need for a vast army of men in its execution.

Because the pending measure—the Smoot or McCumber substitute—is so full of glaring inequalities, it is satisfactory to but few, and allows the agitation for increase to continue without limit. It continues in operation all the expensive and complicated machinery of the Pension Office, including medical examining boards in every part of the country, while the Sherwood bill, which the great mass of the soldiers demands, working automatically, will dispense with the thousands of examining boards, the hundreds of special agents and spies now employed by the department, will stop all special pension legislation, and at the same time be a distinct and positive proof of the gratitude of the Nation to its defenders.

It has been loosely asserted that the Sherwood bill will add $75,000,000 to the expenses of the Government. This extraordinary statement, coming from the Pension Office, was based upon computations shown to have been utterly without merit. It has been satisfactorily demonstrated by Gen. SHERWOOD, by computations made from the official records of the War Department, that the total increase of expense resulting from the Sherwood bill as passed by the House of Representatives could not exceed $45,000,000, while under the provisions of the original bill as introduced in the House, denying the benefit of its provisions to soldiers having an income of $1,000 per year, the increase of expenditure would not exceed thirty-five millions.

MISPLACED ECONOMY.

The chief objection to the Sherwood bill is based upon the charge that it calls for an extravagant expenditure of public money and violates the promise of economy in the administration of the Government.

I have not been greatly interested in the discussion as to what this or that bill will cost. It is a reflection upon the integrity, the honor, and the financial ability of this Nation to consider a question of that kind in that light.

Sir, I have already shown that to pay an honest debt, or to follow the common instincts of humanity by caring for the defenders of the Republic in their old age, is not an extravagance and violates no pledge of economy in government.

But, sir, this cry of economy in governmental expenditures has a new and strange sound. It has been seldom heard during the past 12 years, while the expenses of government have nearly doubled and climbed up to the enormous figure of a thousand million dollars a year.

It was not heard in connection with the appropriation of hundreds of millions of dollars for the Panama Canal, nor has it been insisted upon during the time that the taxpayers of the Nation have been contributing a half billion dollars or more in carrying out the work of subjugating the Philippine Islands and benevolently assimilating the Filipino people.

It was not urged while 200,000 new offices were being created or while the salaries of all the principal officeholders in the United States were being largely increased because of the high cost of living.

It is a cry that is only heard when the proposition is made to care for the soldiers of the Nation, and is only heard then because they have grown too old to hold official station and because it is thought that on account of old age and decrepitude they can no longer exert great influence in the political affairs of the country.

Distinguished Senators here have, with great labor, added up all the miserable pittances received by each of these old veterans during the past 47 years, and with a horror-stricken air hold up before us the enormous total of nearly $4,000,000,000. When the proposition was made to double the salary of the President of the United States and then add $25,000 per annum for traveling expenses, did anyone take the time to give to the public the total sum of all the moneys paid to all the Presidents since the formation of the Government?

Or when the proposition was made a few years ago to increase the salaries of Senators and Congressmen, was any computation exhibited of the total amount paid to the Members of the two Houses during the century and a quarter of our national life?

The salaries of the postmasters throughout the country are increased steadily year by year, yet we have heard from no source the vast amount of money that has been paid to these patriotic, self-sacrificing officials during the years of the past.

When pork-barrel appropriations are asked and made for costly public buildings at crossroads and county seats and for the improvement of streams too small for flatboat navigation, no Senator has ever thought of undertaking the mathematical feat of calculating the enormous amount of public money that has been thus wasted during the last half century.

These mathematical prodigies of the Senate never let loose their restrained energies except when the heroes of Gettysburg and Antietam, Chancellorsville and Lookout call the attention of the Government to its broken pledges and its inexcusable ingratitude to the men who saved its life.

Mr. President, in the course of the debate here on yesterday, while Senators were suggesting economy in other departments of Government as a means of providing sufficient revenue for liberal pensions, something was said in the way of jest about the free barber shop and free baths in marble rooms provided for Senators.

These are trifling matters, and I shall not consume any time in discussing them. But, sir, when the old soldier and his wife read in the newspapers that Senators and Congressmen are complaining that they can not live respectably in Washington on salaries of more than $20 a day, with free barber shops, free baths, free Apollinaris water, and free office rent—when they read of the Senators riding in free Government automobiles between their offices and the Capitol, only a square in distance, they can not but marvel at the claim made by some of these same gentlemen that the soldier's request for a pension of a paltry dollar a day is an impertinent demand, to grant which would be gross and intolerable extravagance.

This old soldier, who must pay house rent, pay exorbitant prices for everything he eats and wears, and pay for all out of a pension of $15 or $20 per month, with fond remembrance of the beefsteak now only a memory, must sympathize deeply with his unfortunate representatives in Washington, who are compelled to eke out a miserable existence on $625 per month, with all the little accessories furnished by an unsympathetic Government. The distinguished Senator from Ohio impressed us all on yesterday with his fervid declaration that he would be rejoiced to support a measure giving the old soldier a dollar a day if this poor Government could only afford it. How natural it will be for him as a patriotic American to cover back into the Treasury a part of his next month's salary to aid an impoverished Nation in its struggle with adversity.

It is said that our pension list is larger than that of any nation in the world. I have not examined the statistics, but I hope it is. It ought to be. There was no such war in modern times, and no war ever accomplished such beneficent results.

There is no nation in the world so rich as this, nor has any nation so patriotic a people, nor a people so ready and willing to rally to their country's standard in time of danger, or to make sacrifices, if need be, to contribute of their substance for the care and support of its defenders when by reason of service or age they need such care and support.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me a word?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has just suggested that the pension appropriation of this Government is greater than that of any other government in the world. That is certainly true. It goes further than that. A few years ago I took occasion to call through the State Department for the pension laws of all the countries of the world. They are now on file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions. The fact was revealed that our pension appropriation is larger than that of all the other nations of the world combined. Of course the Senator knows that we do not have an immense standing army such as those countries have and that their expenditure goes in that direction. I think it is better it should go to the ex-soldiers than go to sustaining great armies, as is the case in Europe.

Mr. KERN. The American soldier, who has periled life and sacrificed health for his country, and who can no longer earn a livelihood, still deserves to live—not as an Italian or French or Russian or Turkish peasant, but as an American citizen—and in caring for these veterans we should have in mind the American standard of living, and not that of European or Asiatic countries. Surely those patriotic gentlemen who are clamoring for palatial residences for our ministers and ambassadors abroad, that they maintain our national dignity and prestige, would not advocate a policy respecting the soldiers of the Republic which would place them upon a par with the half-fed and poorly clad people of the world's poorest nations.

Mr. President, I hope I may be permitted to address some words to my brethren of the South, who represent their several States in this body with such distinguished ability.

AN APPEAL FOR JUSTICE.

I know how you venerate the memories of the great leaders of the Confederacy, who with the great leaders of the Army of the Union have crossed the great river and are fraternizing on the farther shore. The differences of the past are happily ended—settled on the basis of fraternity and perpetual union—never more to recur. A common hope, a common destiny, and a common country, with a single flag, bind us in the ties of a common brotherhood.

Your interests are the same as the interests of those of us born under northern skies, and I would subject you to no penalties or burdens which I would not willingly share. My ancestors, even to the first American generation, were born in old Virginia. My father having removed to the North long before the Civil War, was a Douglas Democrat and for the Union, and yet, after the war was over, he so longed for the mountains and valleys of his native State that he returned there, and after a citizenship of 30 years, died at a ripe old age and peacefully sleeps in the bosom of the dear old State that he loved so well.

I state this only to show that in my advocacy of this measure I am prompted by no sectional prejudice nor actuated by any spirit of antagonism.

If you say that you have patiently and uncomplainingly borne the burdens entailed by the war for nearly half a century, I agree with you, but remind you that we have carried our full share of the same burden and at the same time have contributed something to the development of the new South, in every way so marvelous a transformation of a Nation laid waste by war into a rich, prosperous land that blossoms as the rose.

For many years after the Civil War there was widespread distrust of your loyalty in the North—a feeling which, with all my ability, I combated since my boyhood, for I knew you and believed in you and trusted you. But that distrust has been dispelled forever. When the men and women of the North, who were still poisoned by the spirit of war, saw that Worth Bagley, the gallant young son of North Carolina, was the first to give up his life for the honor of his country in the Spanish-American War, when they witnessed the unequaled heroism of HOBSON, of Alabama, at Santiago, when they read of brave old Joe Wheeler's charge at San Juan, and saw the sons of South Carolina and Massachusetts, the sons of Indiana and Georgia, marching side by side under the old flag in defense of the honor of the Nation, then were all doubts removed, and then the union of hearts and of hands was truly consummated.

The war has been ended so long ago that there are only eight men in this body who participated in the conflict—four who fought with the Confederacy and an equal number who fought beneath the Stars and Stripes—all now engaged in generous rivalry as to who shall render the best service for the country they all love alike.

You have borne your burdens with such cheerfulness and acquiesced in the results of the war so generously and loyally that when we ask you to share with us an additional burden, to the end that the old and broken men who fought for the Republic may have the necessities of life during their few remaining days and that their short journey to the grave may be not altogether a cheerless one, we can not but hope that your generous hearts will respond to our appeal.

If I could carry you with me into some of the homes of the Central West where these old soldiers abide, I am sure your hearts would be so touched that you would agree to the liberal provisions of the Sherwood bill. I have in mind the case of an old white-haired veteran, who served his country faithfully and well, and who, with his old wife, the sweetheart of war times, is waiting for the summons of the Master. They have been always poor, for he has earned his bread with his hands, but has not had the money-making instinct. They can no longer work, but are trying to live on a pension of $16 per month. Half of that sum goes for the rent of an humble cottage; out of the other $8 per month must come food, fuel, clothing, medicines, and medical treatment. The cost of living is such that, of course, they can no longer live on that amount. And the alternative—there are only two places open to them—the soldiers' home for the old soldier and the poorhouse for the sweet-faced old wife, for she is not allowed to accompany him to the home. God forbid that in a rich Nation like this such a tragedy should be possible in the life of any of its defenders.

But there is another alternative, and that is the passage of the Sherwood bill, that will dry the tears in thousands of eyes, bring hope and joy and happiness into scores of thousands of humble homes, and cheer the hearts and quicken the steps of the hundreds of thousands of old soldiers, who during their few remaining years will be living monuments to the generosity of a grateful country, which in the days of its greatest wealth and power did not forget the men whose valor made glorious so many pages of its history.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, in every expression made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], glorying in the acts of heroism of our soldiers, in every expression concerning the duty of this Government toward those soldiers, he has found a hearty response in the hearts of Senators on both sides of the Chamber. But in belittling the efforts of this Government in behalf of the great Army of the Union in the past years by an unfair comparison of the sentiment of the Government toward the soldiers of the Revolution he does a rank injustice not only to the American people and the American Congress to-day, but a still ranker injustice to historical facts.

As every year I read the resolutions of the Grand Army of the Republic, in which resolutions they express their satisfaction and their gratitude for the generosity of the American people in the granting of pension legislation, I feel that the Senator hardly expresses the sentiment of the soldiers of the American Union when he would have us for a moment understand that the Government has been niggardly in the appropriations that have been given for pension purposes.

That there may be no historical inaccuracy upon this great subject, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the condition of our pension laws on the very day in which Daniel Webster made his famous address to the old soldiers of the Revolution. The Senator says in glowing words that the people of that day drew no fine distinctions as to age, as to poverty, as to length of service, but considered only the single question, Did those old men serve the country in that struggle for independence? Ah, Mr. President, does not the Senator know that at that very time, so many years after the war, in order to draw a pension under the service-pension act of that day the Revolutionary soldier must have served at least 9 months. Ever since 1890 the soldier of the Civil War needed only a service of 90 days.

Does the Senator understand that under the law at the time Webster was making his address the Revolutionary soldier who had served 9 months received only the meager sum of $8 per month, and does he also understand that there was a distinction drawn between the soldier of the rank and the commander or the commissioned officers?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. MCCUMBER. The soldiers of the rank received only $8 per month and a commissioned officer received two and a half times as much, while under the existing general law no distinction whatever is made between the man who made the charge and fought the battle and the man who commanded him to make the charge and to fight the battles of the Union.

I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. I only wanted to ask the Senator whether $8 per month pension in those primitive days was not really more than $30 a month would be now?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Scarcely as much as $30 would be now. There is no question but that it would be more than $8 would be now, although for a great many of the things which are common necessities now, if they had been able to purchase them at all, they would have had to pay five or ten times as much as we pay for the same article at the present time. What was a luxury to them is a common necessity for us.

But this is not all, Mr. President. At the time this great address of Webster was made the man who had served in the Revolutionary War must have been in indigent circumstances before he could receive one single dollar. And what was an indigent condition at that time? Our forefathers felt that there would be such a raid made upon the Treasury, in those good old patriotic days referred to by the Senator from Indiana, that just prior to this great meeting in Boston they had enacted a law which cut off from the rolls every man who was not in indigent circumstances, and if he had $150 worth of property he went off the rolls. No man worth over $150 at that time could have drawn any pension whatever under the service act.

I ask the Senator from Indiana in all good faith if he is justified in criticizing the Government of the United States to-day in a comparison of its pension legislation and the generosity that actuates it and actuates the people of the United States with the generosity that actuated the people in 1820 when that legislation was passed?

Again, the Senator says that this will put a stop to private pension bills. Mr. President, I state again, let not our enthusiasm on any proposition run away with our judgment and blind our calculations. As a matter of fact, next year, whether we have this bill or whether we have any other bill, if we find some old indigent soldier who is paralyzed, who requires a constant attendant, the Senator from Indiana will agree with me that $30 a month will not answer his requirements, and he will vote with me to raise it to $50 a month. He knows, Mr. President, to-day that he will do that and that there will be private pension bills in the future as there have been in the past. If he will look at those that are introduced day after day he will be surprised to find the number that call for more than $30 a month.

The Senator from Indiana did not answer the criticism of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] when he asked if under the Sherwood bill a soldier who had served less than one year would ever have an increase in his pension. If under that bill, if he served 90 days and less than 6 months, he should get $15, no matter how old he may be, he will never get a cent more, and the Senator from Indiana, whether the Sherwood bill passes this body or whatever bill may become a law, will join with me again in securing the enactment of a private pension bill to give this man a greater sum of money. Under the Sherwood bill the soldier who has served 6 months and less than 9 months will receive $20 per month, and though he live to be 90 years of age he will never receive another dollar from the Government, unless we reach him by a private pension bill; and the Senator from Indiana again will join with me and other Senators in recommending for him, as the exigencies of the case may demand, a higher rate than that provided under the law.

Mr. President, when we passed the law of February 6, 1907, it was stated by many Senators on the floor that if we should pass that bill it would be the end of special pension legislation. I warned them at that time that such a statement was without due consideration, that we should have just as many private pension bills introduced after the act of February 6, 1907, as we had before; and my prophecy has been fulfilled; aye, and fulfilled several times over. Private pension bills will continue to be introduced and will continue to be acted upon so long as the necessitous conditions of a single soldier who fought for the Government in its time of need shall require an amount of pension greater than the general law allows him; and whenever he has reached an advanced age, has no property, and is unable to take care of himself he will be entitled to receive, and he will receive, from this Government a greater sum of money than is provided in the Sherwood bill.

Under the bill that has been recommended by the committee every soldier will feel that if he lives three or four years longer, as he becomes more feeble he will receive a greater amount of pension. He will know that when he is 66 years old he will receive more than he did when he was 62 years of age; that when he is 70 years of age, by the operation of the act itself, he will receive a greater amount than when he was 66; and that when he is 75 years of age he will receive a greater amount than when he was 70 years of age; but, Mr. President, under the Sherwood bill his status is fixed, not matter what his age, and, instead of there being a decrease of private pension bills, there must necessarily be an increase of private pension bills.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana agrees with me upon one proposition, namely, that we should reach the $30 limit at least as soon as we can. I stated the other day in my argument that I believed the time was near at hand when any soldier who had served six months and had reached the age of 70 years should receive the maximum of $30 per month by a general law enacted by Congress; but if I can not reach that plane in one step, I am willing to take two steps to attain it. I would prefer, Mr. President, to offer a man who was hungry one loaf of bread and let him have it than to offer him two loaves and pull them back. A year from to-day I may be asking the Senator from Indiana to join me in increasing pensions possibly by another $30,000,000 in addition to what this bill calls for; but at the same time I ask him to do that I will also ask him to join me in raising the funds to meet that requirement. Nowhere in any of the arguments which have been made has any Senator who has spoken in favor of the Sherwood bill indicated how we are going to pay the additional expense of its operation. I can be mighty liberal, Mr. President, with a dollar which I have not got in my pocket; I can say what I would do with it if I did have it; but before I do so much talking of what I am going to do with that dollar I think it is my duty first to earn the dollar and then see whether I will make good my statements as to what I would do with it.

Let us be fair to the soldier, fair to the country, say what we mean, and mean what we say.

I will ask the Senator from Indiana to join me not only in a reduction of the expenses of the Government, but in an increase of the revenue to further increase our pensions; for, Mr. President, we all know that it will require both to be able to meet the Sherwood bill or another bill which a year from to-day may still further add to pension appropriations.

Mr. President, I hope that whatever the final outcome may be, the Senate will attempt to pass a bill that will give satisfaction to the soldiers of the Civil War, that will meet the conditions of advancing age, and at the same time that we shall return to our senses and be able to pass a revenue bill that will raise the necessary funds to meet the expenses that will thereby be incurred.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there is no legislation pending before this Congress deserving of more serious and thoughtful consideration than that proposed for increased pensions to the Federal soldiers who served in the late War between the States. Its importance arises not only on account of the greatly increased burdens which it necessarily imposes upon the taxpayers, but also from the fact that the enactment of this legislation, carrying a largely increased appropriation, would preclude the Government from undertaking many measures of reform and of betterment, long delayed but badly needed for the progress and prosperity of this Nation. The prospects of many policies of far-reaching consequence and benefits to all sections of this great Republic are absolutely dependent upon the fate of this measure. Fully realizing this, I have overcome the reluctance which a southern man necessarily feels in discussing this matter, and have concluded to present for the consideration of the Senate reasons why I think this legislation should not be enacted. I hope to do this not in a narrow, sectional, or prejudicial spirit, but from a broad and national standpoint.

I believe, sir, that a flag disgraces the sunshine in which it flaunts if it will not make generous provisions for its brave and valiant defenders. I fully recognize this obligation on the part of the Federal Government toward the soldiers who sustained it during the great war extending from 1861 to 1865. This debt of the Government is great and should be discharged graciously and generously. In saying this I voice the sentiments of the people of my section. The gallant Confederate soldier, however great may be his own want and distress, does not begrudge a generous pension to the Federal soldier for loss and injury sustained by him in rendering service to his Government. These are debts of honor, which no nation can fail to discharge without being discredited and disgraced.

Mr. President, conscious of this great obligation, feeling it deeply and sensibly, let us fairly and dispassionately consider the provisions that the Federal Government has already made for the soldiers who served it during the great Civil War, and ascertain whether the Government has not dealt with these soldiers so generously as to obviate the occasion for the greatly increased pensions as proposed in the pending legislation.

In order to obtain volunteers, and to let the soldiers know what they could expect from the Federal Government, Congress passed and the President approved, on July 14, 1862, an act providing pensions for all disabilities which had been incurred since March 4, 1861, or should thereafter be incurred by reason of wounds received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. The rates for total disability ranged, according to rank, from $30 to $8 per month. This law applied to Army and Navy alike, including Regulars, Volunteers, Militia, and the Marine Corps. Appropriate pensions were to be allowed in each rank for partial disability. The pensions were to continue during the existence of the disability. On death of husband or father the pension went to the widow, or if there were no widow, to the child or children under 16 years of age. Where the deceased officer or soldier left no widow or legitimate child, but a dependent mother, the mother was given the pension. Where the dependent deceased left neither widow nor child nor mother, but an orphan sister or sisters under 16 years of age who were dependent upon him for support, the pension went to such sister or sisters until they severally attained the age of 16 years.

This act was amended on July 4, 1864, by granting $25 per month for the loss of both eyes and $20 for the loss of both feet. It was further amended on March 3, 1865, by making the loss of one foot and one hand to be rated the same as the loss of both feet. These constituted the pension laws upon which the war was conducted and contained the promises of the Government to its soldiers.

In speaking of the liberality of these laws, Commissioner Barrett, in his report of 1864, says:

> No other nation has provided so liberally for its disabled soldiers and seamen or for the dependent relatives of the fallen.

These laws were the most liberal and generous that any nation had ever before enacted. They were the pledges and promises made by the Federal Government to its soldiers during the continuance of this great conflict. They were all that were expected or demanded by the soldiers in these dark hours of suffering, distress, and sacrifice. The only objections heard to these provisions during these years of war were those often made that they were too liberal and would entail too great an expense upon the Government. Every promise, every obligation contained in these acts have been faithfully and completely fulfilled. No person claims that the slightest promise made by the Government has not been more than discharged. Hence, the Government can not be charged with having broken any of its pledges or promises. The Federal Government stands fully acquitted of any dereliction in this respect. Not only has the Federal Government fulfilled every promise, but, as I shall now proceed to show, has far exceeded it in a most generous and magnanimous spirit.

By act of June 8, 1866, the pension laws were amended so as to include orphan brothers under 16 years of age, as well as sisters, and to include dependent fathers, as well as mothers.

An act was passed July 26, 1866, increasing the pension of widows at the rate of $2 per month for each child of the deceased soldier or sailor under the age of 16 years.

These increases were so generous and liberal that Commissioner Barrett expressed a belief that no important extension of the very liberal pension laws would now be contemplated by Congress.

In 1868 an act was passed allowing pensioners arrears of pensions on account of death, wounds, or disease, provided the application was filed within five years after the date of death or discharge on whose account the pension had been or might be granted.

In 1870 laws were passed granting to every soldier who lost a limb during the war an artificial limb or apparatus once in every five years; or, if he elected, money commutation therefor.

In 1868 Senator Sherman, of Ohio, in speaking in the Senate in opposition to an amendment offered to a bill for an increase in pensions, said:

> At a time when we are endeavoring to lower all expenses of the Government, when we have reduced all our appropriations, when we have thrown off $1,000,000 of taxes, and yet when taxes are still very burdensome on our people, when the pension fund is now $33,000,000 a year, twice as much as any nation in the world ever paid before, I ask whether it is worth while for us to increase our pension list on the mere amendment of a bill of this kind.

To-day tax burdens are more than twice as heavy as they were at the time Senator Sherman made this speech, and pension appropriations are now more than four times as great; yet we are called upon to increase the present pension appropriation, amounting to $157,000,000, by $75,000,000 more annually. If Senator Sherman were living to-day this progressive pension extravagance would shock and surprise him beyond measure.

On January 25, 1879, was enacted the arrears act, which was amended by an act of March 3, 1879. These acts provided that all pensions which had been granted under the general laws regulating pensions, or which should thereafter be granted in consequence of death from a cause which originated in the United States service during the Civil War, or in consequence of wounds, injuries, or diseases received or contracted in that service, should commence from the date of the death or actual disability of the person on whose account the pension had been or should thereafter be granted. The rate of pension for the intervening time for which arrears were granted was to be that provided in the pension laws in force for this period.

The laws provided that arrears of pensions should be granted where application for the pension had been or should thereafter be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of July, 1880; otherwise the pension was to commence from the date of filing the application. This extraordinary piece of legislation produced immediately an amazing effect. The opportunity thus given the pensioners of receiving at once thousands of dollars stimulated the discovery of disease and disability which had remained dormant and unknown and had not been discovered for almost 15 years. The number of claims filed for pensions in 1878, prior to the enactment of this law, was 26,304. In 1879, after the enactment of this law for that year, there were filed 47,416 new claims. In the single month of June, 1880, just before the limitation upon the allowance of arrears went into effect, there were 44,532 original Civil War claims filed with the Commissioner of Pensions. This arrears act seems to have carried with it a contagion of disease and disability extending from 1861 to June 30, 1880. It seems to have been more disastrous to the health and comfort of the Union soldiers than had been the armies of the Confederacy. The medical history of the world can show nowhere such a sudden and extensive discovery of disease and disability. This interesting fact presents a fertile field for the investigation of the psychologist. The payments occasioned by this act were enormous.

Under date of January 25, 1886, Gen. J. C. Black, Commissioner of Pensions, estimated that up to June 30, 1885, the aggregate of arrears paid under the act of 1879 was $179,400,000. This leaves out of consideration the cost to the Government resulting from the extraordinary stimulus afforded by the arrears act to the presentation of new claims.

The act of March 19, 1886, provided that the pensions of all widows, minor children, and dependent relatives already on the pensions rolls, or who might thereafter be placed upon the pension rolls, should be increased from $8 to $12 per month. The existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of 16 years was continued.

By act of July 7, 1888, the limitation contained in the arrears act of 1879 was repealed so far as widows were concerned, and widows who were already drawing pensions and who should hereafter obtain pensions were given pensions under this act from the date of the death of the husband. This act involved the payment of large arrears of pensions in cases already on the rolls as well as cases to arise in the future. This act enabled widows who had failed to apply for pensions during widowhood and afterwards remarried to receive in a lump sum pensions for the full period of widowhood. The pernicious character of this act is strikingly illustrated by Commissioner Evans in his report of 1898, in which he gives the case of the widow of a captain of volunteer infantry. The commissioner says:

> In 1871 this captain died. He was not a pensioner and never had filed a claim for pension. His widow remained a widow until March 30, 1887, when she remarried, having filed no claim, and, having remarried, had no pensionable status. In 1893, 5 years after the act of June 7, 1888, had passed, 6 years after her remarriage, and 22 years after the death of her soldier husband, she files her claim for a pension as a widow from the date of the death of her soldier husband in 1871 to the date of her remarriage in 1887—16 years—and gets nearly $4,000, practically for the use and benefit of her second husband.

Commissioner Evans, in discussing the evil effects of the arrears pension act, says:

> The records of national cemeteries have been brought into use for the purpose of determining the names and service of those buried there. Women are then hunted up, who are induced to execute applications for pensions on account of the service and death of these soldiers. These women become pliant tools in the hands of the operators. A prima facie case is made out by means of stock witnesses, and the originator of the fraud pockets the amount of the first payment, leaving the fraudulent claimant to reap the benefit of the future payments. Great difficulty is often experienced by this bureau in disproving a marriage or marriage relations alleged to have occurred 30 or 40 years ago.

This criticism emanates from Commissioner Evans, a Republican selected by President McKinley to administer the Pension Office.

Thus Congress had, by continuously increasing favorable legislation, generously provided for every soldier of the Civil War who had received any wound or injury or contracted any disease or suffered any disability while in the service of the United States. It had also generously provided for the widows, children, and dependent mothers, fathers, brothers, and sisters of all dead soldiers. It had paid arrears of pensions for diseases and disabilities, which the pensioners themselves had not felt or discovered in many years. No limitation was or has ever been made when an application may be filed for injury, disability, or disease incurred. Since war was first waged no other Government of the world has even remotely approached in generosity the legislation that the Federal Government has conferred upon the volunteer soldiers of the Civil War. It stands out preeminently as the most liberal in the world's history.

The assertion so often made, that this Government has acted niggardly toward its volunteer soldiers, is an unworthy slander from which I desire to defend it and those who administered its affairs, from President Grant until to-day.

Mr. President, as broad, as liberal as is the legislation which I have already stated that has been enacted in behalf of the volunteer soldiers of the Civil War, it but half measures the extent of the Government's generosity.

On June 27, 1890, was passed an act known as the "dependent pension law." This act did not repeal any of the liberal legislation which I have already pointed out to the Senate. This act provides that all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now suffering or may hereafter be suffering from mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support, the pension to commence from the date of filing the application in the Pension Office and to continue during the continuance of the disability to earn a support. Widows of those who served 90 days during the Civil War and were honorably discharged, and who married the soldier prior to June 27, 1890, and are dependent upon daily labor for support and have not remarried, are granted pensions at the rate of $8 per month without proving the soldier's death to be the result of his Army service. The law also provides for an additional allowance of $2 per month for each child of the deceased soldier under the age of 16 years. If the widow remarries, she forfeits her pension and the pension is paid to any surviving children of the soldier until they reach the age of 16 years. Under this law all that is required for a claimant to prove in order to obtain a pension is that he served 90 days in the Union Army and to furnish adequate medical evidence that he has a physical or mental disability that disqualifies him in whole or in part for earning a support by manual labor. The pension is granted no matter what may be the cause of the disability, provided it is not the result of the claimant's vicious habits.

A rich man may suffer injury by an accident having no connection whatever with his military service, and which renders him unable to earn a support by manual labor, yet he would receive a pension under this law. This act pensions alike the rich and the poor. It grants pensions to widows of soldiers who were born many years after the Civil War had ceased. It grants pensions to thousands of soldiers whose service was mere nominal, who had never been in a battle, had never seen an enemy's flag, had never incurred the slightest danger, and had never suffered the slightest injury or disability. It treated alike the holiday soldiers, with their 90 days' jaunt, and the brave and gallant veterans who fought in hundreds of fierce battles, and whose courage and valor brought success to the Union cause.

No precedent exists in the history of the human race that can exceed this law for its indiscriminate and promiscuous giving, and for the vast amount of money appropriated. This law more than doubled the number of pensions. The number of pensioners under this act continuously increased, and on June 30, 1906, there were 640,756 persons pensioned under it, and the amount of disbursements for the fiscal year ending at that time was in excess of $74,000,000.

On March 15, 1904, an Executive order was issued directing that age should be taken into consideration in determining disability to make a living by manual labor, and that at the age of 62 years the soldier should be considered to be one-half disabled for the performance of manual labor and be entitled to the rate of $6 per month; at 65 years of age, $8 per month; at 68 years of age, $10 per month; and at 70 years of age, $12 per month, the maximum total disability under the law. This order continued in force until, by acts of April 24, 1906, and March 4, 1907, it was provided that at the age of 62 years and over it shall be construed as a permanent specific disability within the meaning of the pension laws. By this law all pensioners at the age of 62 years were paid the maximum. This order and laws increased the pension appropriation about $5,000,000 annually.

By act of February 6, 1907, a pension was granted to persons who served 90 days in the Civil War or 60 days in the Mexican War at the rate of $12 per month for those who were 62 years old, $15 per month to those 70 years old, and $20 per month to those 75 years old. This law added about $15,000,000 annually to the pension appropriation.

By act of April 19, 1908, the widows and minor and helpless children who were pensioned in their own right and who were then on the pension rolls, or who might thereafter be placed on the pension rolls at a lower rate, should receive a pension of $12 per month. This act removed all restrictions as to the amount of income that a widow might possess. Thus wealthy widows under it could become pensioners of the Government. These widows might be born many years after the termination of the Civil War. This act increased the pension appropriation about $12,000,000 annually.

Thus in the last five years legislation has been passed increasing the appropriations for pensions to the large amounts named. The liberality and generosity of the Government in these recent years have, indeed, been marked and striking. During these five years the Government has expended in pensions, in the aggregate, $770,521,427. The census of 1910 shows that all the property—real, personal, money, improvements, crops, railroads, manufactures, and all property of every kind and description—in the State of North Carolina amounted to $681,982,120. Thus in the last five years the Government has given to its pensioners $88,000,000 more than all the wealth possessed by all the people in the great and rich State of North Carolina.

In 1866, immediately following the conclusion of the Civil War, and when deaths, wounds, injuries, and disabilities incident thereto were fresh and numerous, the number of pensioners was 126,722, and the amount appropriated for pensions $15,450,549.88.

In 1911, 45 years after the conclusion of the war, the pensioners numbered 892,098, and the appropriation for pensions amounted to $157,325,160.35.

In 1866 the average paid pensioners was about $122 each annually. In 1911 the average paid each pensioner was $176 annually. The pensioners of 1911 received, per capita, over 40 per cent more than the pensioners of 1866.

Look what a contrast between the pension rolls of 1866 and the pension rolls of 1911. The pension rolls of 1866 consisted of soldiers who had received wounds, injuries, and disabilities in the more than 2,000 battles fought during the great Civil War, and whose valor and courage had been exhibited on many hotly contested fields. Included in these were soldiers who had contracted disease producing disability by service to country. Upon these rolls were the widows who had given a husband to their country's cause, and had experienced all the anxiety, terror, and distress incident to war, with all of its vicissitudes and horrors. Included upon them were fatherless children, mothers, and sisters who had been left dependent and destitute by the death of some soldier who was their main support. Yet the appropriation to this most deserving class of pensioners in 1866 averaged about $122 each annually. The pension rolls of 1911 include, it is stated, about 96 per cent of all the survivors of the soldiers of the Civil War. Upon them are all soldiers 62 years of age who served 90 days in the Army. Upon them are women and children who were born a great many years after the Civil War was terminated. More than half of those receiving pensions under this law never received an injury, never contracted a disease, nor sustained a disability in the Government's service. Upon them is a large part of the 35,987 persons put there by special acts of Congress because they were unable to obtain a pension under the liberal, general pension laws which I have previously stated to the Senate.

By general legislation and special acts many charges of desertion have been removed, and upon them are found many soldiers who failed their country in the hour of battle and need. Upon them are found thousands of soldiers who were never in a battle, never in the slightest danger, and never near nor in sight of an enemy. The pensioners on the rolls of 1911 received an average each of $54 per year more than those most deserving ones on the rolls of 1866, immediately succeeding the war. It is difficult to convince a thoughtful public that the present pensioners, who are receiving 40 per cent more than those contained on the rolls of 1866, are at this time deserving of the proposed great increases.

The pension legislation of 1866 was enacted by the masterful men of the Union side, who successfully conducted the great Civil War and who endeavored to extend proper governmental aid to the deserving and worthy. They were controlled in their measures by patriotic and not political considerations. To denounce their policy as niggardly is to asperse the character and motives of great soldiers and great men who founded and guided the Republican Party and directed the affairs of this Government during four years of storm and stress—men who were devoted to the Union Army and desirous of being liberal and generous to its soldiers.

But, Mr. President, we are told that the present pensioners are poorly and most inadequately provided for. Hence we have pending in the Senate bills providing for greatly increased appropriations to them. We are also told that the time has now arrived for the Government to give some substantial recognition to the demands of the Union soldiers, and that this has already been too long delayed. Despite the fact that in the last five years Congress has passed legislation increasing pensions to the extent of $27,000,000 annually, we have these pending bills proposing to make further great increases. The measure known as the Sherwood bill, which passed the House of Representatives, if enacted into law, the Secretary of the Interior estimates, would increase the present pensions to the extent of $75,651,548 annually. The bill known as the McCumber bill, and which is recommended for passage by a majority of the Committee on Pensions of this body, it is estimated, if passed, would increase the pensions to the extent of $24,112,578. If either of these bills become law, the appropriations necessary to carry them into effect would far exceed the estimates. This has been the experience of every general pension bill yet passed. It will be repeated if either of these bills should become law. I do not purpose to discuss the relative merits of these two measures, each of which has its supporters. Between the two I favor the McCumber bill, as it carries a far less appropriation; but I am opposed to the passage of either. I do not believe there is any occasion at this time for any increased pension appropriations. I believe that the Federal Government has acted so liberally and generously to the Union soldier that no further legislation at this time is needed. The amount that has been already given by the Federal Government to the Union soldiers of the Civil War is unexampled in the world's history.

This Government, since its beginning, has expended in pensions to its soldiers $4,230,381,730.16. Of this amount $3,985,719,836.93 has been expended in pensions on account of the Civil War. The amount expended for the Seven Years' War of the Revolution, in which this country established its independence, was about $70,000,000. Thus we have already given to the Union soldiers over 50 times more than was given to the soldiers who won our independence. We now pay to the Union soldiers twice as much each year as was given to all the soldiers of the Revolutionary War.

The Sherwood bill, if passed, would give to the present pensioners annually increases exceeding what this Government gave in pensions on account of the entire Revolutionary War.

Pensions that have been paid to the soldiers of the Civil War are already eighteen times more than this Government has paid in pensions on account of all of its other wars from 1776 to the present time.

The pensions on account of the Civil War, as previously stated, aggregate about $4,000,000,000. The amount is so large that it is almost beyond the comprehension of the human mind.

Let us endeavor, by comparison, to form an idea of the size of this vast amount and what it could purchase. The census of 1870 shows that the value of all property, real and personal, money, crops, railroads, improvements, and property of every kind and character, in the 11 Confederate States which seceded, consisting of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, aggregate only $2,686,078,782. Thus, the pensioners of the Civil War have already received about $1,300,000,000 more than all the real and personal property, of every kind and description, contained in the 11 seceded States by the census of 1870. If all the property, real and personal, of every kind and description, in the 2 great and rich border States of Kentucky and Maryland, as shown by the census of 1870, were added to all the property of every kind contained in the 11 seceded States it would not equal what has already been paid to the pensioners of the Civil War. The value of property had greatly increased in these States from 1866 to 1870. This is not the assessed value, which is far less, but the true value of all property in these States as disclosed by this census. This can give us some conception of the generous aid extended by this Government to the soldiers of the Civil War. It stands without a parallel in the world's history. Not only has the Federal Government appropriated this vast sum in pensions, but it has provided 10 national homes, which are now accommodating about 25,000 survivors, and maintained at the expense of the Government. It has also, by law, given marked preference to soldiers in civil appointments.

With this long record of liberal and generous legislation, it can not be argued that this Government has been in any respect unfair or neglectful of its soldiers. If the Government is deserving of criticism for its past action, it is rather on account of the heavy burdens of taxes which it has imposed upon the people in order to pay these pensions. Our annual expenditures for all purposes now exceed $1,000,000,000. This burden of taxation is so heavy that the people are scarcely able to bear its weight.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, estimates that the receipts for the coming year will exceed the ordinary expenditures by only $30,000,000. But the receipts have fallen far below his estimates. If any of the bills for increased pensions should be passed, we would be confronted with a deficit. This would mean an increase of taxes. It is useless for us to close our eyes to this fact. I do not believe the people of this country are willing to be further burdened with taxes in order to give increased pensions. If either of these bills is passed, it means that there can be no reduction, no retrenchment, in governmental expenditures. It means that there can be no reduction in the present exorbitant tariff taxes, which have greatly increased the cost of living and produced great suffering and distress. It means an abandonment of the progressive increase of our Navy, which has become indispensable to national safety and prosperity. It lessens our ability to construct needed public buildings, to improve our rivers and harbors, in order to give increased commercial facilities and opportunities, and to improve our public roads and highways, in order to develop the rural sections of our country.

If the pending legislation is passed, it would be soon followed by other legislation providing for further increases. The rates then given will in a few years be greatly increased. The retired volunteer officers' pension bill is but waiting the enactment of this legislation to make its appearance in Congress, which, when passed, will cost the Government many million dollars. The passage of a general pension bill has always been marked by the claim that it would be the last legislation of this kind and was all that was needed to give relief. Experience has demonstrated that each was but the precursor of others providing for greater increases. If our pension policy of the past, with constant increases, is continued, the day is not far distant when our annual appropriation for pensions will exceed $250,000,000.

Being persuaded that the great mass of American people is now more in need of relief from the heavy burdens of taxes and the high cost of living than are the pensioners in need of greater pensions, I shall vote against the bills now pending proposing an increase in pensions. The whole people is deserving of more consideration than is any special class, and especially when that class has already been and is the present recipient of Government favors unexcelled.

I am opposed to this legislation because I believe its enactment would be prejudicial to the best interests of all sections of this country alike. There is no section of the country in which the burdens imposed by these bills upon the masses would not exceed the benefits derived.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. McCUMBER. The bill has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read and amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, last Saturday when this bill was under consideration the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] called attention to certain reductions in the pension pay roll made by the Pension Bureau in 1893. The same day from memory I explained that those reductions were principally due to a decision rendered by the department construing the act of June 27, 1890, and setting aside an order which had formerly been issued by the Pension Bureau which had incorrectly construed the act of June 27, 1890. I was unable to recall the name of the case in which this corrected construction, as I maintained, of the act of June 27, 1890, was rendered, and the Senator from Kansas also was unable to recall it.

On Monday I sent for the decisions, and I find that the case is found in volume 7 of the Pension Decisions, page 1, and it is known as the case of Charles T. Bennett. I have desired since that time to call attention to this case that the case might be embodied in the RECORD, and I wish now to call attention to the case and to ask that it be embodied in the RECORD, and also that a report of the commissioner explaining his conduct under this case be embodied in the RECORD. I will indicate the parts to be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to explain to the Senate very briefly, in connection with embodying this case in the RECORD, the exact point that was under consideration.

The act of June 27, 1890, provided for pensions to certain soldiers who were not injured in the line of service. The prior law provided for pensions for service injuries or service disabilities. Under the prior law, where the disability was one of service origin, specific sums had been fixed for each particular injury and those sums appeared without reference to the ability or lack of ability of the soldier to perform manual labor or to earn a livelihood.

The act of June 27, 1890, expressly limited the pensioners to inability to perform manual labor and to inability to earn a livelihood, or rather the pensions were to be based upon the condition in which the soldier was left with reference to his ability to perform manual labor and with reference to his ability to earn a livelihood.

These provisions in the act of June 27, 1890, upon which the amount of his pension was to be fixed, were not found in the prior law, but were applicable solely to those soldiers whose injuries were not of service origin or whose disabilities were not of service origin. Reading from the act of June 27, 1890, we have—which incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support.

And again, the pension was to range from $12 to $6, "proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support."

For the year ending June 30, 1893, the pension pay roll went up to $156,908,000. For the prior year, ending June 30, 1892, the pension pay roll was $139,394,000. So the pension pay roll went up for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, in round numbers $17,000,000, and under the construction of the act of June 27, 1890, which the bureau had put upon it, it was estimated that the pension pay roll for the fiscal year to end June 30, 1894, would be $165,000,000. In consequence of this Bennett decision and the subsequent procedure by the bureau under this decision the pension pay roll for the year ending June 30, 1894, was $139,394,000, and for 12 years thereafter it averaged about $139,000,000.

The bureau prior to the Bennett decision had confused in its application of the amount to be paid for each disability the rule prescribed in the act of June 27, 1890, and the rule prescribed in the old law, which applied to injuries of service origin, and had practically abolished the provision of the act of June 27, 1890, which required the disability to be one which affected the applicant's capacity to perform manual labor and which fixed the amount of his pension proportioned to his capacity to perform manual labor.

The decision in the Bennett case only required the bureau to come back to the statute as it was drawn by Congress, and it required that the amount to be paid to each pensioner under the act of June 27, 1890, should be that prescribed by Congress and not that prescribed by the bureau, which set aside the act of Congress.

The difference between the two acts and the error of the bureau can be illustrated in the Bennett case. Bennett had two disabilities, a slight deafness in each ear. He could hear a watch tick half an inch from his ear. Under the evidence it did not affect his ability to earn a support at all. It did not affect his ability to perform manual labor. Yet he had been awarded under the act of June 27, 1890, $12 a month which could only go to him under that act for total disability. Under the law applicable to an injury of service origin, slight deafness in either ear was rated at $6, and for partial deafness in both ears it was $12. The bureau applied to this pensioner who was asking a pension under the act of June 27, 1890, the classification of pension provided for under the law fixing injuries of service origin, although his disabilities were in no sense of service origin.

Before the Bennett opinion was filed it was submitted to the Attorney General's Department for approval, and I wish to embody the opinion in the RECORD and also to embody some extracts from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions in the RECORD.

There may have been and there were some other suspensions, but the bulk of the reduction of pensions and the bulk of the suspension of pensions followed this Bennett decision, and were simply for the purpose of bringing the administration of the bureau into complete compliance with the act of June 27, 1890.

The rule in the Bennett case was followed after Judge Lochren ceased to be commissioner and after I ceased to have any connection with the department—at least I understand it was followed; it certainly ought to have been followed, because it was the law. The amount of the pay roll subsequently having remained for years practically at the figures to which Judge Lochren reduced it clearly indicates that the ruling in the Bennett case must have been followed by the successors to Judge Lochren.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY JOHN M. REYNOLDS TO THE COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS, MAY 27, 1893.

Charles T. Bennett, late private Company F, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers, filed his original application for an invalid pension under the provisions of the Revised Statutes, on July 5, 1886, alleging that while in the service and in line of duty at Raleigh, N. C., about June 1, 1865, he was prostrated by a sunstroke, from which resulted a disease of the head and loss of hearing.

The claim was rejected by your bureau February 18, 1892, upon the ground that the evidence failed to establish the existence of any disability due to the claimant's Army service.

From said action the claimant appealed March 19, 1892. The evidence shows that the appellant enlisted September 14, 1864, and was discharged June 23, 1865; but the records of the War Department, in evidence, show neither treatment for any disability during said period nor the existence of any disabling cause, but that he was carried on all rolls and returns as "present for duty" from enlistment to discharge.

The affidavits furnished in support of his claim do not satisfactorily establish the origin of the alleged disability, and in the certificate made by the board of examining surgeons at Vincennes, Ind., on November 3, 1886, the following language is found: "This man seems to be in vigorous health, and we discover no evidence of a diseased nervous system, not tremulous, but in good flesh, and looks as if he was never afflicted by any great nervous prostration. * * * We would state that he has slight deafness in both ears, but not of sufficient character to warrant us in making a rating." The rejection of the applicant's claim for invalid pension, for the reasons given, was proper and is affirmed.

This appeal brought up, also, the application made by the same claimant for a pension under the provisions of the second section of the act of June 27, 1890. Under this second section your bureau, on January 29, 1891, granted to the claimant the maximum rating of $12 a month.

The only disability found to exist upon medical examination, as declared by your bureau, was "slight deafness of both ears." This deafness was so slight, according to the certificate of the board of examiners, that he could hear a watch tick in each ear when it was within one-half inch of each.

To entitle the claimant to a pension under the provisions of the second section of the act of June 27, 1890, it was necessary that he should be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of his own vicious habits, which incapacitates him for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support, in which event he might be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month. As the claimant was suffering simply from "slight deafness," according to your finding, which was so slight that he could hear a watch tick one-half inch from each ear, the physical disability clearly failed to come within the requirements of the law. Such "slight deafness," of necessity, could not incapacitate for the performance of manual labor, and yet the claimant was allowed the largest sum provided for under this section of the act of June 27, 1890.

In order to ascertain with certainty the basis upon which this pension was rated, the following communication was addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., May 23, 1893.

To the Commissioner of Pensions:

SIR: I herewith return to you the papers in the case of Charles T. Bennett, late private, Company F, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers, certificate No. 533762.

Please furnish me at your earliest convenience the basis of rating in this case, which places "slight deafness" of both ears, under the act of June 27, 1890, at the rate of $12 per month.

Very respectfully,

JNO. M. REYNOLDS,
Assistant Secretary.

To which the following answer was furnished through the Commissioner of Pensions:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., May 23, 1893.

HON. WILLIAM LOCHREN,
Commissioner of Pensions.

SIR: In response to your request that I prepare an answer to the communication of this date addressed you by the honorable Assistant Secretary concerning the basis of rating in this case for a slight deafness of both ears at $12 per month, under the act of June 27, 1890, I have to say that this rate was allowed in accordance with Order No. 164, which directed "that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, shall be rated at $12 per month." The inability of the applicant to perform manual labor was not taken into consideration.

At the time of the action taken in this claim, January 29, 1891, the schedule rate for slight deafness of both ears was $15; hence the rate of $12 was allowed. Since December 4, 1891, the schedule rate for slight deafness of both ears has been $6, and such cases have been allowed at this rate since the above date. I have recently suspended action in this class of cases.

Very respectfully,

THOS. D. INGRAM,
Medical Referee.

The department will now consider whether the method of rating followed in this case is in accordance with the law.

The second section of the act of June 27, 1890, provides as follows: "SEC. 2. That all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late War of the Rebellion and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support; and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office after the passage of this act, upon proof that the disability then existed, and shall continue during the existence of the same."

It will be seen that this section only provides for a pension where the applicant has been incapacitated for earning a support by manual labor. Incapacity to perform manual labor, to a degree which produces inability to earn a support, is the basis of pension under this section; yet the report of the medical referee shows that the pension was allowed by your bureau in this case in pursuance of Order No. 164, and the inability of the applicant to perform manual labor was not taken into consideration.

The following is a copy of Order No. 164:

In regard to fixing rates of pensions under act of June 27, 1890.

That all claimants under the act of June 27, 1890, showing a mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits and which incapacitate them for the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support in such a degree as would be rated under former laws at or above $6 and less than $12, shall be rated the same as like disabilities of service origin; and that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month shall be rated at $12 per month.

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Approved.

CYRUS BUSSEY, Assistant Secretary.

It will be seen that this order required that all cases showing a pensionable disability under the act of June 27, 1890, should be rated as if of service origin.

The law applicable to pensions of service origin is found in the Revised Statutes, and is as follows:

"Any officer of the Army, including Regulars, Volunteers, and militia, or any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps, or any enlisted man however employed in the military or naval service of the United States, or in its Marine Corps, whether regularly mustered or not, disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty," etc.

The only requirement to obtain a pension under this act is disability by reason of wound or injury received or disease contracted while in the service and in line of duty.

Incapacity to perform manual labor, which is the foundation to the right to pension under the act of June 27, 1890, fixes an entirely different standard of disability from that just mentioned, contained in the Revised Statutes, covering injuries of service origin. Disabilities incurred while in actual service and incapacity, upon applicant long after service ceased, are made by the law to stand upon an entirely different footing. Those incurred during service and in line of duty are pensionable without regard to capacity to earn a support, and are graded without reference to this condition. Disabilities resulting from causes other than of service origin are only pensionable when incapacity to labor joins with incapacity to earn a support, and the grades of rating are dependent upon these two conditions. When by Order No. 164 it was declared that disabilities under the act of June 27, 1890, should be rated as of service origin, the very principle which governed the rating under the act of June 27, 1890, was displaced and a rule applicable to a different act was substituted.

This case illustrates the effect of the departure by your bureau from the terms of the act of 1890:

1. The applicant was awarded for "slight deafness" not of service origin, $12. The award was made under the act of 1890. It was given by your bureau for "slight deafness," because under an entirely different act, applicable to disabilities of service origin alone, $15 was the lowest rating for "slight deafness."

2. "The inability of the applicant to perform manual labor was not taken into consideration." Yet the act of 1890, under which the applicant sought and was allowed a pension, made inability of the applicant to perform manual labor, in such a degree as to prevent him from earning a support, the foundation of his claim.

It is, therefore, clear that the rating under the Revised Statutes for disabilities of service origin was substituted by Order No. 164 for the rating provided under the act of 1890.

The order having resulted in one error, a second error naturally followed, and the inability of the applicant to perform manual labor was not taken into consideration. In a word, the act of June 27, 1890, was changed and superseded by Order No. 164, as construed by your bureau, and by a practice that neglected to take into consideration the ability of the applicant to perform manual labor.

It is hardly necessary to present argument or to support by authority the proposition that neither the Secretary nor the commissioner can by order or practice supersede an act of Congress. The power of the department, so far as orders and practice are concerned, is limited to an execution of the law; it ceases when an effort is made to supersede the law.

You will, therefore, take such steps as are necessary to reopen this case and to pass upon it in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 27, 1890, disregarding any order or practice which is in conflict with the plain letter of the law.

The foregoing decision was approved by the honorable Secretary of the Interior, and was by him submitted to the honorable Attorney General, who also approved it. After this concurrence the following order was made revoking the one dated October 15, 1890, No. 164, referred to therein:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., May 27, 1893.

To the Commissioner of Pensions.

SIR: Order No. 164, signed, "Green B. Raum, Commissioner of Pensions," and approved, "Cyrus Bussey, Assistant Secretary," of date, October 15, 1890, is hereby revoked.

You will prepare, for approval of the Secretary, new rules and regulations covering the proof of the right to pensions and rates of same in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress approved June 27, 1890.

Your attention is directed to the fact that the disabilities which are pensionable under this section must be of a permanent character, incapacitating for the performance of manual labor to such a degree as to produce inability to earn a support. You will observe, also, that the rate of pension is fixed at not less than $6 nor more than $12 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support.

You will have an examination made to determine what pensions have heretofore been allowed under section 2 of the act approved June 27, 1890, in disregard of the terms of said act and in conflict with the ruling of this department in the case of Charles T. Bennett, this day transmitted to you.

Respectfully, HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

[From the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year ending June 30, 1892.]

ACT OF JUNE 27, 1890.

But recognizing the difficulty of tracing disabilities to service origin after a long lapse of time and the fact that deserving soldiers, who in their advancing years were incurring disabilities not of service origin unfitting them from earning a support by manual labor, were proper objects of the national bounty, the act of June 27, 1890, was passed, providing that all persons who had served in the military or naval service of the United States in that war 90 days or more, and had been honorably discharged therefrom, and who were suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits which incapacitates them from earning a support by manual labor, shall be pensioned at not more than $12 nor less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support.

Under this act, aside from the requisite service and honorable discharge, there is but one condition that can give any right to pensions, viz, "a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support." But by Order 164, issued October 15, 1890, the commissioner, with the approval of the Assistant Secretary, directed that specific disabilities should be rated in applications under this act as they would have been rated under the schedules then in force, if of service origin, up to $12 per month. The medical referee stated in answer to inquiry that under this order the capacity of a claimant under the act of June 27, 1890, to perform manual labor was no longer even considered in adjudicating his claim, but that his disabilities were rated, up to $12 per month, as if his claim had been made under prior laws for like disabilities of service origin.

It is perfectly clear that under this Order 164 in granting pensions under this act of June 27, 1890, the act itself was set aside and disregarded, with the result of granting pensions not authorized by any law. This was shown in the Bennett case, which called your attention to this order and to the practice under it. There the claimant, applying under this act of June 27, 1890, was pensioned at $12 per month for slight deafness not of service origin. This slight deafness could not interfere with his capacity to perform manual labor, and such a pension has no warrant to sustain it in any law. It is absolutely void. The statement of the medical referee, above mentioned, made it appear probable that under Order 164 many pensions were illegally granted, and, pursuant to your order of May 27, 1893, a board of revision was formed of the ablest and most experienced men of the bureau to examine the cases allowed under that act and cull out such as had no legal basis to rest upon, but with instructions to disturb no case where, by the most liberal construction of the evidence, the right to the pension could be sustained under any law. In cases where it was believed that pension could not be sustained and another medical examination was thought necessary, the payment of the pension was ordered to be suspended pending investigation, according to the practice of the bureau from the beginning; and at the proper time the usual 60-day notice was given the pensioner within which he could ask for a medical examination or supply further evidence of his right to his pension.

This practice of the bureau, always followed, is the correct practice. It is not the withdrawal or taking away of a pension, but the temporary withholding of its payment where it appears to be unlawful, pending a proper inquiry. Upon your suggestion that even this temporary withholding might work hardship where upon the face of the papers it appears that the pensioner is entitled to at least some less rating, the practice has been modified and changed as to the cases under this act so far that suspensions of payment pending the 60 days are only ordered when on the face of the papers it appears prima facie that the pensioner is not entitled to any pension. It is certain that there are many cases like the Bennett case, where persons not entitled to any pension will be removed from the rolls, but the work has not yet proceeded far enough to enable me to forecast the result. Undoubtedly under the system of adjudication which followed the promulgation of Order No. 164 many persons perfectly able to perform manual labor, under the persuasion of claim agents familiar with the effect of that order, applied for and received pension for specific disabilities not of service origin and not properly pensionable under the act of June 27, 1890. This also accounts for the large proportion of late claims under that act, comprising the aftermath in the work of claim agents, which are now being properly rejected.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Georgia has called attention to the case upon which he based the order. The only regret the friend of the soldier can have is that in rendering that decision or in order to get a case that would be satisfactory the Pension Bureau picked out a case that was perhaps the most unfair case that could be selected in all the bureau. A man had been given a pension, as stated by the Senator from Georgia, upon two disabilities, and I shall read the finding. I desire to comment upon this because it is my purpose to call attention to another decision later on.

As the claimant was suffering simply from "slight deafness," according to your finding, which was so slight that he could hear a watch tick one-half inch from each ear, the physical disability clearly failed to come within the requirements of the law. Such "slight deafness," of necessity, could not incapacitate for the performance of manual labor, and yet the claimant was allowed the largest sum provided for under this section of the act of June 27, 1890.

Upon that decision an order was entered, and my complaint is that they made that order, based upon a case where the man had no disabilities that incapacitated him from the performance of manual labor, apply to some 31,000 cases where perhaps the soldiers had special disabilities that might prevent them from performing manual labor, and a decision based upon this one case was used to take away from eight thousand and over pensioners their pensions and to reduce 23,000 pensions, and that, too, without giving them an opportunity to be heard and without giving a chance to furnish one word of evidence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was not the suspension for 60 days, and were they not notified and invited to bring up additional evidence?

Mr. CURTIS. Their pensions were taken away immediately afterwards. After their pensions were suspended, they filed evidence, many of them, and had their cases reinstated. To show how unfair the ruling was, I remember having over 100 cases reinstated in the Pension Bureau upon the testimony that was on file when the pensions had been reduced from the fourth Kansas district alone.

I contend that this question was decided before, and it was unnecessary for the Reynolds decision, because Assistant Secretary Bussey had passed upon the same order, No. 164, in a case that was taken before the Secretary.

I want to call the Senate's attention to the langauge used by Assistant Secretary Bussey where he construes this law, and properly construes it. If the Secretary or the commissioner had followed this ruling there would have been no trouble. I read from page 194, volume 6, Decisions of the Interior Department in Appealed Pension Claims, 1892–93:

The basis of rates under the act of June 27, 1890, is inability to earn support by reason of incapacity for manual labor, due to a permanent mental or physical disability not the result of vicious habits. In determining whether an applicant is entitled to a rate under said act for the character of disability aforementioned, the only question is: Is he, from the cause or causes involved—be they one or many—disabled for the performance of manual labor to the extent represented by the fractional rate of six-eighteenths? If so, he is entitled to the minimum rate of $6, and so on, until the maximum rate of $12 is reached.

That was the construction of the law placed upon it by Assistant Secretary Bussey.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What was the date of that?

Mr. CURTIS. January 7, 1893. That was the true construction of the law, and if it had been followed there would have been no complaint.

In addition to securing the decision, or having the decision rendered upon the case, that was unfair to the soldier, and after the order was issued under which so many suspensions were made, a new order was issued by the department leaving the ratings in the hands of the medical referee; and surely the distinguished Senator will admit that that order was wrong, because——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That order was very promptly modified, was it not?

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to say such a storm of protest went up from one end of the country to the other against the ruling and the action of the department under it that they had to withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator remember how long was that order in force? Was it not withdrawn as soon as it was brought to my attention?

Mr. CURTIS. The Order 225 was issued June 9, 1893, and was withdrawn by Order 241, which was issued September 2, 1893; so Order 225, the one of which I complain, was followed several months. I am very glad to have the Senator state that he had referred the matter to the Attorney General, and that he depended upon the Commissioner of Pensions in this matter; but I say, and I believe the facts justify me in making the statement, that the administration of the Pension Office during Judge Lochren's administration and that of the distinguished Senator from Georgia was unfair to the Union soldier. It was based upon——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not true that when they first began after the Bennett decision to suspend the cases that had been improperly given pensions under Mr. Raum's erroneous construction of the statute, they suspended them all, but that that lasted only a few days, and that the change took place to simply reducing the size of the pension where they had any evidence in the record to justify any pension. Does not the Senator recall the fact that Judge Lochren in his first report mentions that those complete suspensions only lasted for a few days, and that after conferring with me I requested, if there was any evidence at all to suspend a pension, to leave the pension; and I should like to ask the Senator's attention to the report of Commissioner Lochren in 1893. He is quite familiar with this matter; really he is more familiar with the details, I suppose, than I am; he has kept up with it:

> This practice of the bureau, always followed, is the correct practice. It is not the withdrawal or taking away of a pension, but the temporary withholding of its payment, where it appears to be unlawful, pending a proper inquiry. Upon your suggestion that even this temporary withholding might work hardship where upon the face of the papers it appears that the pensioner is entitled to at least some less rating, the practice has been modified and changed as to the cases under this act, so far that suspensions of payment pending the 60 days are only ordered when on the face of the papers it appears prima facie that the pensioner is not entitled to any pension.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I just wanted to call the Senator's attention to the language read from the report of Judge Lochren as commissioner.

Mr. CURTIS. I can not agree with the Senator that it was a temporary matter, because I did not arrive in Washington until August, 1893, to attend the extra session of Congress, and the practice was then going on in the department. The order had been issued several months before.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What practice do you mean?

Mr. CURTIS. The practice of reducing pensions and of withdrawing pensions without giving the pensioners an opportunity to be heard. So it must have been in existence several months.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator if it had not always been the practice in the bureau, where it was found that the evidence submitted did not justify a pension, to suspend it and notify the pensioner?

Mr. CURTIS. I never heard of any such action until the action by the Secretary of the Interior while the distinguished Senator from Georgia was then Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was the first term in Congress of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. It was my first term.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He had never heard of anything until that time.

Mr. CURTIS. I had heard of a good many things before I came to Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was not the board of review that Judge Lochren appointed with the approval of the Secretary composed almost exclusively of Republicans and old soldiers?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not agree with the Senator upon that statement. I looked up their record at one time. My recollection is that a majority of them belonged to the other side.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But let me ask——

Mr. CURTIS. I do not care who they were, but since the Senator referred to the board, the fact remains that they held up the cases just as long as they could, and they did it against the interest of the soldier. If the distinguished Senator will look over the record he will find, I think it was in 1894 or 1895, there were 104,000 cases examined by that board and they found something wrong to delay action in nearly every case. To be exact, they found cause for delaying action in 103,000 cases. Do you tell me that such conduct as that is fair to the soldier?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Were they not simply enforcing the act of June 27, 1890, and is it not true that records had been made by applicants who were not entitled to pensions under the act of June 27, 1890, and they were misled as to their rights by the erroneous order issued by the bureau under Raum?

Mr. CURTIS. That would not affect the case.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. Therefore the record and the evidence they had when examined showed that they were not entitled to a pension under the law.

Mr. CURTIS. That would make no difference if the case had not been allowed, but if the case had been allowed the presumption was in favor of the soldier, and the soldier should have been given an opportunity to file his testimony, as afterwards was permitted by law of Congress. After this order was issued, in December, 1893, Congress enacted a law giving them a chance to be heard before their pensions should be taken away from them, and it was not until that act was passed that the practice was discontinued in the department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would the presumption be that the record showed that the soldier was entitled to a pension when the whole procedure of the bureau had been under an order by the commissioner utterly disregarding the provisions of the law and changing the law and dispensing with the requirements of the law? Would not the presumption be that the proof did not make a case that entitled the soldier to a pension under the law?

Mr. CURTIS. The difficulty is that the Senator does not state the fact. The truth of it is that as soon as the Bussey decision was rendered the then Commissioner of Pensions continued to pass upon cases under that decision, and it seems as though the new Commissioner of Pensions, after the order was issued by the distinguished Secretary of the Interior, suspended all the cases upon a hasty examination, 23,000 of them, and dropped 8,000 of them. As I said to the distinguished Senator, they must have been careless, because thousands of those cases were afterwards restored to the pension roll upon the papers that were on file when their pensions had been reduced and when their pensions had been taken away. As I said before, I remember in the one district that I had the honor to represent 100 of the men who had had their pensions reduced or taken away had been restored by the bureau upon the evidence that was on file when the former action had been taken by the commissioner, which to me is conclusive evidence.

Let me call the attention of the distinguished Senator to a case I mentioned the other day, the case of an old soldier at Emporia, Kans., where the pension was taken away upon an anonymous letter. I said to the commissioner then, "Are you going to take a man's pension away simply because some man writes a letter to which he has not the manhood to sign his name?" He said, "That soldier is not entitled to a pension"; and they took it away, and I was over three months getting that man back on the pension roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not undertaken, I will say to the Senator, to defend such an order. As I said a moment ago, I have no doubt that there were mistakes made. But I was insisting that the general procedure was in consequence of an utter misconception of the law by the predecessor of Judge Lochren, and that the difficulty which surrounded the change was due to that misconception of the law or the confusing of the two statutes, and that the bulk of what took place was simply in conformity with bringing the bureau to an administration of the law as Congress had written it.

Mr. CURTIS. My answer to that is that it was at the beginning that the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Bussey, had construed this law, and the Reynolds decision was absolutely unnecessary, and the Reynolds decision was unfair to the soldier. The Reynolds decision was based upon an unfair case, and it should never have been rendered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How was the Bennett decision unfair to the soldier?

Mr. CURTIS. I did not mean to that one soldier, but to soldiers at large. I say it was unfair, because the department officials picked out a case to decide where no disability existed which prevented the man from performing manual labor, and taking that unfair case a general order was issued to apply to all cases. As a result of the general order, they reduced the pensions of 23,000 soldiers and took pensions away from over 8,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know how many cases there were just as strong as the Bennett case?

Mr. CURTIS. I could not tell that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator one more specific question.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator agrees, does he not, that the rule prescribed by Commissioner Raum was a misconstruction of the act?

Mr. CURTIS. I agree that the officers of the department who passed upon the rule gave it a more liberal construction than the law at that time justified; but I claim, further, that Assistant Secretary Bussey corrected that by rendering his decision in the case to which I have called attention. I might say—because perhaps all Senators know it—that it is an unfortunate practice in the departments that whenever the head of a department indicates that he wants to follow one certain line of decision the employees of the department go to the extreme in that way, and if there is a change made and a new head wants to pursue another course, the officers usually go to the extreme in that way. The Senator knows that to be true. It is the practice in the departments here, and has been ever since I have been in Washington. I regret it, for I think the officers should perform their duty honestly and fairly, regardless of the wishes of the head of the department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Senator from Kansas what time in January did Assistant Secretary Bussey make his ruling?

Mr. CURTIS. On January 7, 1893.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know whether that rule had been put into active operation in the bureau before March 3, 1893, or whether the examiners were merely continuing under the order of Commissioner Raum?

Mr. CURTIS. I will say to the Senator that they were proceeding under this decision, because he passed upon Order 164 in the decision, and naturally, as his opinion controlled and governed the department, it is reasonable to suppose that they proceeded thereafter to construe the order according to that decision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He did not revoke the order of Commissioner Raum, did he?

Mr. CURTIS. It reads as follows:

> It appears, however, that said order, as understood by the department when approving it, may have been misconstrued by your bureau so far as it has been your practice to add the separate nominal and schedule rates allowed for several disabilities in making a rate under this act. * * * It is directed that the views herein expressed be observed in future adjudications of claims under the act of June 27, 1890.

So it was the direct order or decision repealing order 164 and directing the bureau to construe the law as indicated in Assistant Secretary Bussey's decision, as I have shown.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 4624) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that certain Senators may desire to have some amendments made to the other private pension bills on the calendar, or, at least, desire to examine them, and therefore I ask that all the private pension bills on the calendar go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered, and the next bill on the calendar, being a private pension bill, will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

JOHN L. O'MARA.

The bill (S. 2243) to correct the military record of John L. O'Mara and grant him an honorable discharge was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

> That in the administration of the pension laws John L. O'Mara, late of Company I, Thirteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on August 16, 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John L. O'Mara."

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES ON OIL LANDS.

The bill (S. 3045) to provide for agricultural entries on oil lands was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read, and an amendment, which was offered by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], is pending.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 1, line 6, after the word "entry," it is proposed to insert "under the mining laws of the United States and," so as to read:

> That from and after the passage of this act unreserved public lands of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, which have been withdrawn or classified as oil lands, or are valuable for oil, shall be subject to appropriate entry under the mining laws of the United States and under the homestead laws by actual settlers only, etc.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will state that under the general withdrawal act of June 27, 1910, that is already provided for. I think, therefore, the amendment is absolutely unnecessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WATSON. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 2, after the word "oil," it is proposed to insert the words "and gas."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I observe the effect of the amendment is that it reserves gas, and I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 3, line 7, after the word "oil," it is proposed to insert the words "and gas."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 4, line 4, after the word "oil," it is proposed to insert the words "and gas."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah to express in a few words the exact effect of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in many of the Western States there are certain lands that have been withdrawn from settlement as oil lands, though they are agricultural in their character. This bill simply provides that in the future there may be homestead entries made upon such lands, reserving, however, the right of the Government to the oil and gas underneath. The entries are made with that reservation. It will allow great districts in the western country to be entered under the homestead law, reserving, however, as I have said, the oil and gas to the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There has been some work going on in the department, has there not, to perfect a bill which would allow agricultural entries on a considerable class of land?

Mr. SMOOT. A bill has already been passed allowing these same entries upon coal lands withdrawn, and this is following that out exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When was that bill passed?

Mr. SMOOT. It was passed some time in 1910; but it was after the withdrawal order of January 27, 1910.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there not now a bill pending from the department providing a way to make agricultural entries?

Mr. SMOOT. There is none that I know of, Mr. President. This is the only bill of the kind which is now before Congress. This is simply extending the reservation to oil and gas lands, the same as the general law applies to coal lands. I wish to say that the department is in hearty accord with this bill and recommends its passage.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the bill amply preserve the facilities for the Government, or anyone at the instance of the Government, to bore for oil?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill specifically provides that—

> The reserved oil deposits in such lands shall be disposed of only as shall be hereafter expressly directed by law.

I call the Senator's attention to that provision.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that the title of the bill should be amended so as to include the word "gas."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment to the title.

The SECRETARY. After the word "oil" and before the word "lands" it is proposed to amend the title by inserting the words "and gas," so as to read: "A bill to provide for agricultural entries on oil and gas lands."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title will be so amended.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next bill on the calendar, Senate bill 5045, being a pension bill, will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1505) for the relief of certain officers on the retired list of the United States Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. BRISTOW. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over. The two bills which are next on the calendar, being House bill 14918 and House bill 17671, are pension bills, and under the previous order of the Senate they will be passed over.

The bill (S. 180) providing for the celebration of the semicentennial anniversary of the act of emancipation, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], who is not now present, desires to be heard upon that bill, and I ask that it go over on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3116) to amend section 1 of the act of Congress of June 22, 1910, entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," so as to include State land selections, indemnity school and educational lands, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that that bill go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over at the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

The bill (S. 2151) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use at his discretion surplus moneys in the Treasury in the purchase or redemption of the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. SMOOT. That bill has been read in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read in full, but, without objection, the Secretary will reread the bill, as it has been some little time since it was read.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, that is a matter of very considerable importance. I do not suppose the Senator in charge of it is prepared to go through the detailed explanation that some of us would desire before the bill is passed upon.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps not to-day, and, if the Senator so desires, I will ask that the bill go over.

Mr. BACON. That will be satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over at the request of the Senator from Utah.

DISPOSAL OF INDIAN LANDS IN TOWN SITES.

The bill (S. 256) affecting the sale and disposal of public or Indian lands in town sites, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read twice and the amendments reported by the committee have been agreed to. If there are no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if I recollect correctly, that bill embraces exactly the same provisions as those contained in the bill which was reported by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] with reference to the withdrawal of certain lands in that State. It provides, as I understand, a general law, giving to communities in former Indian reservations where town sites may be laid off a certain percentage—I have forgotten how much, but a very liberal percentage—of the proceeds of the sale of the lots, and also devoting 10 acres to the purposes of public buildings, parks, and so forth. The Senate, after very elaborate debate, I may say, in the case of the particular bill that I have mentioned, affecting certain lands in South Dakota, determined that that was an injustice to the Indians; that the original enabling act for each of the States affected by the bill was liberal to them in reserving a certain proportion of the public lands to the public education of the State; and that the effect of this further provision would be to take that much more from the Indians. If I recollect aright, I have correctly stated the proposition. The Senate then passed upon it.

Mr. CURTIS rose.

Mr. BACON. I will inquire if this is not of the class of bills to which I refer?

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I was going to ask the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I understand this to be a general bill of that kind.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, in conversation with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], who had charge of the bill to which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] refers, after the bill was laid aside I understood him to say that the committee would probably make a change in the bill in accordance with the informally expressed view——

Mr. BACON. That was done.

Mr. ROOT. I think this bill retains that same provision that we expected would be cut out.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a moment, so that I can reply to the Senator from New York. The Senator is correct in that statement, and on that account the bill was defeated in the Senate; but on the motion of the Senator from South Dakota, who changed his vote for the purpose, it was reconsidered; then it was again brought before the Senate with that objectionable feature eliminated, and the bill was passed in that form. If I understand this bill correctly, it would not only restore that feature as to South Dakota, but it would restore it as to all of the States, and I think it has been certainly indicated by the Senate that they thought that would be an injustice to the Indians, and it has been condemned.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I have examined the calendar, and I find that it is the bill to which the Senator from Georgia referred, and does cover the same proposition. I suggest that the bill go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 4762) to amend an act approved February 6, 1905, entitled "An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 8, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 2, 1903, entitled 'An act to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system in the Philippine Islands,' and to provide for the more efficient administration of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over, and the next two bills on the calendar, Senate bill 5193 and Senate bill 5194, being pension bills, will be passed over under the previous order.

The resolution (S. Res. 136) directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges relative to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

ALICE V. HOUGHTON.

The bill (S. 5137) for the relief of Alice V. Houghton was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from friends of Miss Houghton I understand that the amount carried by the bill, which I think is $3,500, is not satisfactory, and they would very much prefer to wait until the House of Representatives acts in this particular case. There is a bill now pending in that body for her relief, and from what was told me by her closest friend, I think she desires that bill to be acted upon before the Senate bill is considered. For that reason I ask that it go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

JAMES ANDERSON.

The bill (S. 1043) to correct the military record of James Anderson was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask to have the report read in that case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report of the committee, as requested by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. If any Senator will explain the bill I will not ask for the reading of the report; but it is now 50 years after the close of the war, and I think we ought to be very careful about passing bills of this character. When a man has been dishonorably discharged from the service and after 50 years comes here and asks for a correction of his record, I think some one ought to explain it. I should be glad to hear such an explanation.

Mr. CURTIS. The report is very complete and explains the case fully. The case was examined by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the bill was unanimously reported by the committee. They found that a great injustice had been done to the soldier. I hope the Senator will not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask that it go over for the present, so that I may examine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over at the request of the Senator from North Carolina.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

The bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill, being the unfinished business, will be passed over.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.

The bill (H. R. 17242) to authorize the Northern Pacific Railway Co. to cross the Government right of way along and adjacent to canal connecting the waters of Puget Sound with Lake Washington at Seattle, in the State of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Northern Pacific Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Wisconsin, and having authority to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the waterway connecting Puget Sound with Lakes Union and Washington at Seattle, in the State of Washington, at a point at or near the head of Salmon Bay, to cross and occupy the right of way owned by the United States adjacent to and along that waterway, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War may deem equitable and fair to the public, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEWIS F. WALSH.

The bill (S. 3873) for the relief of Lewis F. Walsh was announced as next in order, and the Secretary read the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that is one of the bills proposing to correct a military record, and while I do not know that I shall have any objection to it, I should like to have some Senator explain the bill, or I will ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over at the request of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: Mr. President, I was necessarily detained from the Chamber and in committee when the bill (S. 3873) for the relief of Lewis F. Walsh came up on the calendar and was passed over. I should like now to call it up. It is a very short military record bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I merely asked that it be passed over because I wanted to know what are the facts.

Mr. WARREN. It is merely to give a poor widow who has a number of children, the pension that would come to her, her husband being dead, if his record were clear, and the report shows that the record ought to be cleared.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was he a deserter?

Mr. WARREN. He was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. If that is true why——

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up. I do not care to debate it until it is taken up.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall not object to its being taken up, but I should like to hear an explanation of it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes: That in the administration of the pension laws Lewis F. Walsh, who was a private in Company C, Third Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 25th day of November, 1864, but that no pension shall accrue prior to the approval of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. As will be seen from the official report of The Adjutant General of the Army, quoted in the committee report on this bill, Lewis F. Walsh was mustered into service September 17, 1861, as a private of Company C, Third Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, to serve three years. He was promoted in the following May to sergeant; later to first sergeant, and then to sergeant major with transfer to the noncommissioned staff. He was captured by the enemy in May, 1863, and after parole rejoined his regiment, received honorable discharge from his first enlistment, and reenlisted as a veteran volunteer. Three months after his second enlistment he was reduced to the ranks on a charge of intoxication and assigned to his former company, C, the rolls of which show him deserted November 25, 1864.

It seems to me that the Government can afford to overlook this soldier's fault at this late date, in view of his long and faithful service throughout almost the entire war and up to a date less than six months prior to the close of the war, and that the triviality of the offense for which the soldier was reduced to the ranks and humiliated, which action was the cause of his quitting the Army without leave, and the privations and sufferings which he endured in Libby Prison, make this an exceptionally appealing case.

The purpose of this bill is to give a pensionable status to the soldier's widow, the mother of his five children, who, with her children, is in destitute circumstances and has no means whatever except her earnings from laundry work. The soldier died in November, 1911, after many years' suffering from paralysis.

To sum up the case, the soldier served throughout almost the entire war under two enlistments. In his first enlistment he rose from the ranks through successive promotions to noncommissioned offices up to sergeant major, and served on the noncommissioned staff. He had been in Libby Prison, and it is probable that the effects of his imprisonment brought about the one fault of an otherwise good soldier—that of becoming intoxicated. He was a high-spirited man, and, having been reduced to the ranks for intoxication, all of his high spirit, which had made him an exemplary soldier, rebelled against the disgrace that had overtaken him, and in anger, suffering from humiliation and the taunts of his comrades, he deserted. But regardless of his long and valuable service to almost the close of the war he received nothing from his country in way of pension, and the pending bill, if enacted, will simply give a small pension for a few years to his widow.

Mr. OVERMAN. When was he married?

Mr. WARREN. The information that comes to me—and I may say that the family lives in Springfield, Mass.—is that this is an aged woman; that she is obliged to earn her support by doing laundry work.

Mr. OVERMAN. They would not be the soldier's children?

Mr. WARREN. Why not? As a matter of fact, they are his children.

Mr. OVERMAN. They would be over the pensionable age.

Mr. WARREN. They may be over the pensionable age, but if they are unable to support themselves they would have to be supported by her.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the children be entitled to a pension?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought the Senator said "a widow and children."

Mr. WARREN. It is merely to enable her to receive a widow's pension. I did not intend to convey the idea that additional pension would be granted the children.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator spoke of the "widow and children."

Mr. WARREN. I spoke more particularly of her destitution. She is in destitute circumstances. I have nothing further to say about the case.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall make no objection to the consideration of the bill, but I shall not vote for its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 4778) to correct the military record of John P. Haines was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is a bill to correct a military record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina desire that bill to go over?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from North Carolina the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1337) authorizing the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Lloyd L. R. Krebs, late a captain in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, a major in the Medical Corps on the retired list, and increasing the retired list by one for the purposes of this act, was announced as next in order.

RITTENHOUSE MOORE.

The bill (S. 2414) for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Rittenhouse Moore $3,650.05, being the amount stated and claimed by him, as set forth in House Document No. 100, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, for overwidth dredging in the Potomac River below Washington, D. C., and recommended by the Secretary of War, as therein shown.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice in the report Charles J. Allen, lieutenant colonel, Corps of Engineers, makes this statement:

I also think that in case the allowance should be made Mr. Moore on account of this claim of his, he should be required, before being paid, to accept the same as in full for any and all claims against the United States on account of both overwidth and overdepth dredging done by him under the said contract of November 1, 1899, and the said two supplemental contracts thereto.

I remember something of the claim. I am not going to object to the passage of the bill, but I wanted to have the following proviso put in:

Provided, That this sum shall be deemed to be and shall be accepted as full and final settlement for any and all claims against the United States on account of both overwidth and overdepth dredging done by the said Rittenhouse Moore under the said contract of November 1, 1899, and the said two supplemental contracts thereto, as stated in the said House document.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator inserts that proviso, I suggest to him that the word "overwidth" ought to be taken out in line 9, before "dredging," and then the proviso provides for both overwidth and overdepth dredging. The Senator will perceive in the body of the bill it is for overwidth dredging. Let that word go out.

Mr. SMOOT. In the claim it is for overwidth and for overdepth.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator will observe that the proviso covers both.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out the word "overwidth" in line 9.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; let that amendment be agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, before the word "dredging," strike out "overwidth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In looking at the bill, I suggest that in line 7 the word "being" should be stricken out and the words in his own statement inserted, "in full settlement for."

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "being" and in lieu insert "in full settlement for."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is agreed to. If there be no further amendments the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Section 2 provides that where a party entitled to claim the benefits of this act dies before securing a patent therefor it shall be competent for the executor or administrator of the estate of such party, or one of the heirs, to make the necessary proofs and payments therefor to complete the same; and the patent in such cases shall be made in favor of the heirs of the deceased purchaser and the title to said lands shall inure to such heirs, as if their names had been especially mentioned.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE OWENS, JOHN J. BRADLEY, AND OTHERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like very much to have the Senate return to Senate bill 2014, which was passed over in my absence.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2014) for the relief of George Owens, John J. Bradley, William M. Godfrey, Rudolph G. Ebert, Herschel Tupes, William H. Sage, Charles L. Tostevin, Alta B. Spaulding, and Grace E. Lewis, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read in full within a few moments.

Mr. ROOT. I wanted an explanation of it; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 3, after line 6, insert:

Parcel No. 10. The south half southwest quarter of section 17, and the north half northwest quarter of section 20, township 25 north, range 11 west.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] objected to the bill because there was an adverse report from the Secretary of the Interior, or the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in reference to the measure.

Mr. ROOT. I did not object to the bill. I felt unwilling to let the bill pass in view of what I saw in the report as coming from the department without some reason being given for overruling the department, and there was no one to explain the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In reference to this particular measure I desire to say that the parties who are named in the bill were, most of them, residents of Oregon. I believe one of them was an officer in the United States Army, Capt. Bradley, stationed at Vancouver Barracks, in the State of Washington. All these parties, at a very large expenditure, took up some lands under the timber and stone act in the State of California. They went down there in compliance with the law and went upon the lands and took them up and completed the payments, and finally a certificate was issued.

Now, it seems that after—possibly before—these entries were made the lands were withdrawn from entry, but instead of sending the notice of withdrawal to the land office in the district where the land was situated, it was sent to another district; and these people, after the withdrawal had been made and after they located the land and paid out this money, still had no notice of it. The Government knew they had filed on it and issued final receipts in accordance with the location. After the final receipts were issued, after they had completed the purchase, they found the notice of withdrawal had been sent to a land office in another district. The locators never had any notice of the withdrawal of the lands for forest-reserve purposes or any other purposes.

The Secretary of the Interior, in making his report on this claim, concedes the justice and equity as to several of the parties, notwithstanding he approved the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture that the claims be not approved. The letters here are quite extensive. They show the exact condition of this land and the expenses to which all the parties went. The Public Lands Committee of the Senate were unanimously in favor of reporting the bill favorably, notwithstanding the adverse decision. It is a case which appeals very strongly to the equitable side of any court, because the people not only located on the land, but they paid the money, and the entries had been approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and final receipts were issued.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire if the amount which is to be paid to each individual is the amount which he paid into the Treasury?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is not for a payment at all. No method is provided for repayment, as it is simply to allow the location of these people to stand; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 8, to insert:

To Dolly Neely a patent for the parcel designated in the foregoing section as No. 10.

The amendment was agreed to.

MARY G. BROWN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 4734) for the relief of Mary G. Brown and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "appropriated," to strike out:

The following sums to the following persons: To Mary G. Brown, $157; to Thomas Brown, $157; to Lily Brown, $157; to Levina Cordier, $157; to Josephine Cordier, $157.

And to insert:

The sum of $157.40 each, for payment to the following-named persons, said sums being the pro rata shares due said persons in the payment made to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 372), namely: Mary G. Brown, Thomas Brown, Lily Brown, Levina Cordier, Josephine Cordier.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $157.40 each, for payment to the following-named persons, said sums being the pro rata shares due said persons in the payment made to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 372), namely: Mary G. Brown, Thomas Brown, Lily Brown, Levina Cordier, Josephine Cordier. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay said sums to said persons, taking their receipts therefor.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of the collector of customs for the district of Puget Sound, State of Washington, shall be $6,000 per annum, which shall be full compensation for all services rendered and in lieu of all fees and allowances.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. PAGE. Do I understand that the Senator will object to the reading of the bill? It has not been read.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a long bill and I am positive it can not be passed to-day. There are a number of bills that I should like to get off the calendar to-day, and it is for that reason I have objected.

Mr. PAGE. I had no expectation of the bill being considered to-night, but I did think the Senator would consent to the formal reading. It has not been read as yet.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a long bill; it is now after 4 o'clock, and I should like to get along as far as possible with the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next bill will be announced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was done with Order of Business No. 348?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill went over.

Mr. SMOOT. It just went over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why did it go over?

Mr. SMOOT. There was objection to taking it up for consideration under the five minute rule.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a very lengthy bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a bill of some importance to the country, and most of the other bills are just to give some place a public building. It seems to me the bill might be considered.

MARY J. WEBSTER.

The bill (S. 4839) for the relief of Mary J. Webster was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let the bill go over.

CHOCTAW AND CREEK TREATY LANDS.

The bill (S. 3306) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the status of the Indian reserves set aside under the Choctaw treaty of 1830 and the Creek and Chickasaw treaties of 1832, for which no patents have been issued and the ownership of which is in question, and appropriating money therefor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. That bill was introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] and should pass, but since its report a bill covering the same question has passed the House, and the Committee on Indian Affairs has authorized a favorable report. I believe if the Senator from Alabama were here he would ask to have this bill go over until the House bill is reported. I think it had better go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

THE LAWRENCE (MASS.) STRIKE.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 231, for the investigation and report by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor regarding certain labor conditions in Lawrence, Mass., submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER February 26, 1912.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any factious opposition to this resolution, but I want to say to the Senator from Washington that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires to make some observations about it, and if it is to be seriously considered I have some matter that I desire to put into the RECORD. I will read at this time a letter received from the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor in response to an inquiry I made of him:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
Washington, March 6, 1912.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your telegram of to-day inquiring if the Bureau of Labor is now investigating the Lawrence strike; and if so, how thorough the investigation will be, I beg to say that the Commissioner of Labor, with several assistants, left Washington for Lawrence on February 28 for the purpose of making an investigation into the conditions surrounding the strike in that city. In a matter of this kind it is, of course, impossible to make in advance of the actual investigation an outline of the matters to be covered, but it is expected that the Commissioner of Labor will make his inquiry a thorough one. Definite information will doubtless be secured regarding the wages, hours of labor, and other conditions of employment of the operatives in the mills, as well as information as to their standard of living and the cost of the principal items of their cost of living.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES NAGEL, Secretary.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. Just an additional word, Mr. President. In view of this letter from the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, which informs the Senate that an investigation is now going on, and in view of the further fact that the strike is practically ended in Lawrence and the operatives are returning to their work with increased wages, it seems to me we ought not to agitate the matter further. That is my impression.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not my desire, Mr. President, to agitate the matter further at all. The fact disclosed by the letter which has been read by the Senator from New Hampshire seems to me simply to add an additional reason why the resolution should be adopted. If this investigation has been made, whatever expense is attached to it has already been incurred; and what objection there could be to reporting the result of it to the Senate is beyond conception. The effect of the resolution would be, substantially, if the investigation has already been made, simply to call upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to transmit the results of that investigation here.

The matter has been discussed several times. There are a great many things that might be said about the conditions which justified the Senate in having this information, but it seems to me unnecessary to say them. Some amendments have been offered, and if they are presented, I have no objection to either one of the pending amendments. I think the amendments and the resolution could be passed without affecting anyone's rights or calling for anybody's presence, or discussion.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the fact that the senior Senator from Massachusetts is interested in this matter, I ask that the resolution may go over until he is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The resolution will go over.

ISOLATED TRACTS OF PUBLIC LAND.

The bill (H. R. 19342) to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to isolated tracts of public land was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 2, line 8, after the word "owns" to insert "lands," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2455. It shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to order into market and sell at public auction, at the land office of the district in which the land is situated, for not less than $1.25 an acre, any isolated or disconnected tract or parcel of the public domain not exceeding one quarter section which, in his judgment it would be proper to expose for sale after at least 30 days' notice by the land officers of the district in which such land may be situated: Provided, That any legal subdivisions of the public land, not exceeding one quarter section, the greater part of which is mountainous or too rough for cultivation, may, in the discretion of said commissioner, be ordered into the market and sold pursuant to this act upon the application of any person who owns lands or holds a valid entry of lands adjoining such tract, regardless of the fact that such tract may not be isolated or disconnected within the meaning of this act: Provided further, That this act shall not defeat any vested right which has already attached under any pending entry or location."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF PRINTING LAWS.

The bill (S. 4239) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. For the same reason that I asked that Senate bill 3 be passed over I ask that this bill may also go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

WHITE RIVER BRIDGE, ARK.

The bill (H. R. 16680) to authorize the board of county commissioners of Baxter County and the board of county commissioners of Marion County, in the State of Arkansas, acting together for the two counties as bridge commissioners, to construct a bridge across the White River at or near the town of Cotter, Ark., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT GRAND RAPIDS, MINN.

The bill (H. R. 18155) authorizing the town of Grand Rapids to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Itasca County, State of Minnesota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHOCTAW AND CREEK TREATY LANDS.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I was out of the Senate attending a meeting of a committee when Order of Business 356, being Senate bill 3306, was passed over. That bill has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has that bill marked as having been passed over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I suppose it was passed over because I was absent.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] made a statement to the Senate that a similar bill had already been passed by the other House, which was expected over here in a day or two, and that if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] were present, no doubt he would ask that the bill go over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The House bill is here. It is practically the same bill, and I want to ask that that bill be substituted for the Senate bill and be now considered and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3306, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3306) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the status of the Indian reserves set aside under the Choctaw treaty of 1830 and the Creek and Chickasaw treaties of 1832, for which no patents have been issued and the ownership of which is in question, and appropriating money therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Alabama offers an amendment to that bill in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I have moved that House bill 16661, which is in language almost the same and in effect exactly the same as Senate bill 3306, be substituted for that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the House bill as passed by the House be substituted for the Senate bill named by him.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that it now be considered.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes; and that it now be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the House bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 16661) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that this bill passed the other House on the 4th instant and was referred to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. If the Senator from Alabama should offer that as an amendment, it would still be a Senate bill and have to be returned to the other House.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I move that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the bill just read.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Alabama for a moment. I suppose he seeks to accomplish the same purpose by both bills; and I want to suggest the inqury to him whether the Senate bill does or does not cover a larger ground than the House bill? I notice the Senate bill refers to all the lands set apart and allotted to Indians under two treaties.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. One by the Choctaw treaty of September 27, 1830, and the other the Creek treaty which is mentioned in the House bill. The House bill seems to carry but one. Of course, if the Senator from Alabama is satisfied, all right.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The House bill strikes out the lands that were conveyed to the Choctaw Nation and limits them to the Creeks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily detained from the Chamber for a few moments, and has just sent word that he would like this bill to be considered when he is present. I trust the Senator from Alabama will consent to it going over until the Senator from Kansas arrives.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly; let the bill go over under the circumstances.

Mr. CURTIS subsequently said: Mr. President, when the bill (S. 3306) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the status of the Indian reserves set aside under the Choctaw treaty of 1830 and the Creek and Chickasaw treaties of 1832, for which no patents have been issued and the ownership of which is in question, and appropriating money therefor, was reached on the calendar the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] was absent, and I asked that the bill go over, believing that he would desire to have substituted and passed a bill which has passed the House on the same subject. With the permission of the Chair and the Senate, I will say that I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16661) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832, to report it with an amendment and to submit a report (No. 490) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee having reported the bill, the Chair assumes that the Senator from Alabama will not press his motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the House bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I withdraw that motion and ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House bill just reported.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The bill, as I understand, has been reported with an amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the Secretary read only the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary a few moments ago read the House bill.

Mr. CURTIS. The committee has reported a substitute for the House bill, which is the Senate bill.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. OVERMAN. That has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the United States hereby relinquishes all of its right, title, and interest in and to the lands set apart or allotted to the Indians under the Choctaw treaty of September 27, 1830, and the Creek treaty of March 24, 1832, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patents, without awaiting applications therefor, to those shown by the records of that department to be entitled thereto: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to affect any right of the original Indian owners of said land or their heirs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I move that the Senate bill on the calendar on the same subject, being Calendar No. 356, Senate bill 3306, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FRANKLIN, N. H.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4655) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Franklin, in the State of New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. What is the necessity for skipping a part of these measures on the calendar, Mr. President?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the Senator from Idaho can object.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to object.

Mr. GALLINGER. One purpose I had in view was, thinking we had been here long enough to-day, to move to adjourn.

Mr. BORAH. For fear the Senator might move to adjourn after he gets his bill through, I think it would be better for us to run along a little further in order that we may get some other measures through.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right, if the Senator objects.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to object, if the Senator will not move to adjourn until we pass other bills on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly will not if the Senator from Idaho desires that other bills shall be passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before I agree to such an arrangement, I should like to know how far down on the calendar is the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him?

Mr. BORAH. I do not object.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4655) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Franklin, in the State of New Hampshire.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, after the words "sum of," to strike out "one hundred" and to insert "ninety," and in line 4, after the word "dollars," to strike out "which said sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other Government offices, in the city of Franklin and State of New Hampshire, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $90,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The resolution (S. Res. 230) authorizing and directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges against HENRY ALGERNON DU PONT, a Senator from the State of Delaware, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over.

PROTECTION OF VALDEZ, ALASKA.

The bill (S. 5272) appropriating $75,000 for the protection of Valdez, Alaska, from glacial floods was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, after the words "sum of," to strike out "seventy-five" and to insert "fifty-five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $55,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and it is hereby, appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the War Department for the protection of Valdez, Alaska, and adjacent territory from glacial floods.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I notice that this bill comes from the Committee on Commerce. It appears to have been originally for the purpose of protecting property belonging to the United States, but in the report from the Adjutant General the statement is made that it is not deemed necessary for the protection of property belonging to the Government of the United States. It seems to me we ought to have some kind of a statement as to the necessity for this work. We are appropriating, through the Committee on Military Affairs, a sum of $125,000 a year for the development of Alaskan roads; we are appropriating, through the Committee on Territories, I believe, annually something like $120,000 or $130,000 of the Alaskan revenues for the same purpose; and here is an appropriation apparently for the protection of the town of Valdez, not of Government property, but for the protection of town property. As I understand, those towns have their own revenues and their own means of looking after matters of this kind. This is not for navigation; it is purely for the protection of a town from a local danger. If we once set the precedent of beginning to use money in the Treasury for the protection of a town, I do not know where we are going to end.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Nebraska I will state that this is a bill which, as I recollect, was prepared in the War Department and presented at their request before the Committee on Commerce. There is a printed report accompanying the bill. There is a specific statement in a letter from the Secretary of War to the effect that the appropriation is desired for the preservation of a number of public buildings at Valdez.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to read to the Senator the letter from The Adjutant General, in which he states:

"DEAR SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the inclosed report made by Maj. J. B. Cavanaugh, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, with reference to the protection of the town of Valdez from damage due to glacial flood waters, and also to the indorsements thereon by Lieut. Col. Richardson, president Board of Road Commissioners for Alaska, the Acting Chief of Engineers, and the Quartermaster General. While the necessity for this protective work appears to be clearly shown, the interests of the War Department involved do not warrant an application to Congress for the necessary funds. It has occurred to me that you might care to personally take up this matter with a view to securing an appropriation, in which event the department would be glad to render assistance in carrying out any project that might be undertaken."

There is an abstract of Maj. Cavanaugh's report, but not a full copy of it, on file in this office.

HENRY P. MCCAIN,
Adjutant General.

FEBRUARY 23, 1912.

That seems to me to indicate that, so far as the Government is concerned, there is no necessity for this work; that it is purely for the benefit of that town, which has its own revenues.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should simply like to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the same condition with relation to the Federal Government does not obtain in Alaska which obtains in any other Territory of the United States. Consequently the objection to aid by the Federal Government in a case of this kind that might apply to any State or to any Territory does not apply there.

The remarkable condition exists there that, although it is an American population of intelligent pioneers, they have never been allowed any degree whatever of self-government, and they have no opportunity to raise taxes to protect themselves against conditions of this kind. Alaska is an appanage of the United States, absolutely subject and tributary to the United States in every way, and the obligation, I think, rests upon the United States to assume the responsibilities which go with the government of a Territory.

The town of Valdez is situated immediately in front of a glacier. It is a comparatively old town, having been in existence for a long time, and the buildings, the institutions, and the settlement there have become permanent. The danger from this glacial stream can be avoided by the expenditure of a reasonable amount of money, and it seems to me the appropriation is a perfectly proper one.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Des the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BOURNE. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I call attention to page 2 of the report, where it is stated:

> On August 3, 1911, Maj. Richardson was directed by telegraph to report specifically and in detail what he would recommend for protection of the public interests. He replied August 5, giving the location and situation of the public buildings—Signal Corps buildings and terminals of telegraph line and road, district court and Federal jail buildings and post office—and setting forth the work done from time to time by the citizens for their protection against floods. He expressed the opinion that permanent protection could be given to public buildings and property at an expenditure not to exceed $50,000 or $60,000.

Valdez is situated at head of Valdez Bay, which is a tributary of Prince William Sound. It is at the foot of a great big glacier—Valdez Glacier. The Government has a military post there, and it is the terminus of the military road leading from there to Fairbanks on the Tanana River. It is, as I have said, right at the foot of a glacier, which is continually thawing. The town and the public buildings, the telegraph office, the post office, the signal station, and other buildings there are threatened and in danger. I might say that Valdez is also a terminal station of the telegraph-cable system of Alaska. The whole telegraph and cable service in that country is under the control of the Federal Government, and not in private hands. This case comes clearly under the claim of protecting property of the United States. The committee have reported that the amount be reduced from $75,000 to $55,000, as recommended by the Government officers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon, as well as the Senator from Minnesota, if it would not be well to put in the body of the bill the words "public buildings" or the words "public property of the United States." When I read this bill I inquired of myself, naturally, why we should be making an appropriation of this kind for a town in Alaska any more than we would make an appropriation for a town anywhere else where there happened to be a flood. Now, if after the words "to be expended under the direction of the War Department for the protection of," there should be inserted the words "public property at," I think it would improve the bill.

Mr. BOURNE. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, after the words "protection of," it is proposed to insert "public property at," so as to read:

> That the sum of $55,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and it is hereby, appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the War Department for the protection of public property at Valdez, Alaska, and adjacent territory from glacial floods.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I notice in reading the letter of The Adjutant General, as set forth in the report, beyond the point where the Senator from Minnesota read, that Maj. Richardson recommended that an engineer of the War Department be sent there to acquaint the department with the facts and ascertain whether the department would be warranted in sending a recommendation to Congress. So Maj. Cavanaugh went there, investigated the situation, and made a report to the War Department, and the War Department does not recommend this bill. I therefore think that we ought not at this late hour on Saturday evening take up this matter, for if the War Department has not reported in favor of this bill and is really not in favor of it, but against it, the bill ought to go over.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, before the bill goes over let me say a word. After what the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has said. I dare say the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] will realize that there is a great difference between our action regarding this town in Alaska and our action generally. Not only is there Government property at Valdez, not only are the telegraph and the cable lines there under the control of the Government, but we are the legislature for that Territory. The people there have not a self-government; we are their government. Alaska is the property of the United States, regarding which we are to make rules and regulations. We built the cable. Congress for a series of years made liberal appropriations to build the cable to this point; to build the land telegraph line; and to build the military road which comes down to Valdez; and this is nothing more than an additional appropriation, following the settled policy of the Government for the development of that unorganized Territory of the United States, which is without any Territorial government, and following the recognized and established policy for the development of that region, and insuring communication.

I think the position taken by the War Department was not justified. I think the interests of the War Department—that is, the interests that have long been under the charge of the War Department—called upon them to ask for this appropriation. The Assistant Secretary expressed his approval of the measure, only he wishes the Delegate for Alaska to make the application, rather than that the War Department should do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. But he declined to send the estimate. Maj. Richardson requested him to send an estimate to the appropriate committee for this purpose, but he declined to do so. I take it for granted, therefore, that the Secretary of War, from Maj. Cavanaugh's report, has ascertained that the public buildings at Valdez are not in danger, and that this appropriation is really needed to protect the town rather than to protect public property.

Mr. ROOT. What he says is this:

> While the necessity for this protective work appears to be clearly shown, the interests of the War Department involved do not warrant an application to Congress for the necessary funds.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; clearly showing that the appropriation is sought for the protection of the people of the town and not to protect the Government's interests.

Mr. ROOT. Then he goes on:

> It has occurred to me that you might care to personally take up this matter with a view to securing an appropriation, in which event the department would be glad to render assistance in carrying out any project that might be undertaken.

Mr. BROWN. In other words, the War Department is in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. ROOT. It is in favor of the appropriation, but it does not consider—and very likely it is correct—that the buildings at Valdez are so under its control that it is a part of the business of the War Department to send in an estimate for the purpose indicated. Probably it was not; but Congress has from time to time, as it has wanted to do things in Alaska, directed the War Department to do them, each piece of business by itself. It directed the War Department to build a cable, and under the Signal Corps the cable was constructed; it directed the War Department to build a land telegraph line, and it directed it to build the military road coming down to Valdez; but, nevertheless, the War Department is not charged by law with taking care of the buildings in the town of Valdez, and therefore——

Mr. BROWN. Such as the post office.

Mr. ROOT. The post office and other buildings—and therefore they do not consider that they ought to send in an estimate, but that they approve of the money being spent.

Mr. OVERMAN. But they declined to send an estimate.

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. POINDEXTER subsequently said: Mr. President, referring again to the bill (S. 5272) appropriating $75,000 for the protection of Valdez, Alaska, from glacial floods, I move that that bill be taken up and considered, notwithstanding the objection which has been interposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

I should like to say in that connection that the impression that would be gained from the statement of the Senator from North Carolina that the War Department was unfavorable to this measure is not justified by the War Department's report. On the contrary, the report of the War Department indicates that it is favorably disposed toward the appropriation. In some correspondence—probably in some controversy with the Delegate from Alaska, probably because of some feeling between the War Department and the Delegate as to which should act in this matter—the War Department declined to take the initiative and insisted on the Delegate from Alaska taking it. That was all the expression of the War Department amounted to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to say that if we get full information from the War Department, which we have not—the report does not even tell us what the engineer's report was—and if I am satisfied this money is needed for the protection of any interest of the Government, I shall not object to the bill. But it can not pass this evening. So there is no use to take any further action about it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has gone over on the objection of the Senator from North Carolina. A motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection, is not now in order, because the Senate is now, by unanimous consent, proceeding under Rule VIII with the consideration of unobjected matters on the calendar. This bill is objected to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So far as that is concerned, I will not insist upon the motion I have made, but my understanding is that a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill, notwithstanding objection, is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is mistaken. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill, notwithstanding objection, is not in order when the Senate is proceeding, by unanimous consent, to consider unobjected matters on the calendar under the five-minute rule. There is objection to this bill, and a motion to proceed to its consideration, notwithstanding the objection, is not in order at this time.

GRAND ARMY ENCAMPMENT AT PULLMAN, WASH.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 77) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Grand Army of the Republic encampment, to be held at Pullman, Wash., in June, 1912, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMER "OCEANA."

The bill (S. 5207) to provide an American register for the steamer Oceana was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That said steamer shall not have the right to engage in the coastwise trade or enjoy the tolls in the use of the Panama Canal that may be limited by law to American-built ships engaged in the coastwise trade: Provided further, That all repairs or alterations made upon the said vessel shall be made in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES W. CHRISMAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from New Hampshire withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will for a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask him to withhold it in order to afford me the opportunity to call up the bill (S. 5198) to authorize the issuance of patent to James W. Chrisman for the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 13, and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 24, township 29 north, range 113 west of the sixth principal meridian.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I have indicated.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY R. DRAKE.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] a moment ago asked me to withhold the motion that he might call up a bill, and I do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to call up the next order on the calendar.

Mr. BRISTOW. If we are going ahead, let us go ahead in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is the next in order.

Mr. BRISTOW. If we are going to adjourn, let us adjourn. If not, let us take up the calendar and complete it in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that it is the next order of business.

Mr. BRISTOW. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire withholds the motion to adjourn only by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; and I desire, when I have the opportunity, to change it to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Immediately after the disposition of the matter which the Senator from Nebraska has called up I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the following bill.

The SECRETARY. Calendar No. 366, a bill (S. 4663) to authorize and empower the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and to grant the same and the right to operate and maintain a line of railroad, telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines through Vancouver Barracks and Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to Washington-Oregon Corporation, its successors and assigns.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am in error. My bill is not the next in order. It is the next but one.

The SECRETARY. Calendar No. 367, a bill (S. 3917) for the retirement of Henry R. Drake, captain, Philippine Scouts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think the bill involves some inequality of treatment compared with some other bills relating to the officers of the Scouts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from New York will permit me to make a statement, I think the whole matter can be cleared up.

This is a bill which was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] for the retirement in a very extraordinary case of a man who has been in the military service something like 27 years. He was the victim of an accident and later of malpractice. He has been continuously in the hospital for two years. He is crippled for life.

The Committee on Military Affairs was unanimous in the opinion that it presents an extraordinary case warranting his retirement at the rank provided in the bill. He is now a captain in the Philippine Scouts. His retirement as a captain in the Regular Army, I think, is unusual, but it is also an unusual case.

He was injured and taken to the hospital with a broken hip, and the bandages or the splints were prematurely removed. Under order of the surgeon he was subjected to X-ray treatment, which instead of being 30 seconds in length was 25 minutes, the result being severe burns, which have necessitated several operations within the period of two years. His hip is fractured for life, and he is still in the hospital at San Francisco.

If the Senator from New York still desires to object to the consideration of the bill after these statements, I leave the matter with him.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think the treatment of the officers of the Philippine Scouts is a pretty large subject, and I dislike very much to have any steps taken which may seem to confer upon those officers a right or lead them to think they have a right to retirement on the same basis as officers of the Regular Army. Some bills, I believe, have been reported and perhaps passed providing for the retirement of officers of the Scouts as of a lower grade than the commissions which they hold in the Scouts, and I think the subject ought to be taken up with an idea of producing equality. I prefer to have the bill go over in order that that kind of consideration may be given to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 18, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 16, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, be graciously near to us as we thus enter upon a new congressional day that these Thy servants may be inspired and guided in the way of righteousness, truth, and justice; that their enactments may be in consonance with Thy holy will; that the dignity of law may be respected and upheld by the people, and lawlessness disappear; that life and property may be rendered more secure; in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

THE ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have placed in the box in the usual way a report (No. 423) upon the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Isthmian Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone. I understand that several members of the committee wish to present minority views (H. Rept. 423, pt. 2). I ask unanimous consent that five legislative days be allowed for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have five legislative days in which to present their views on the bill referred to. Does the gentleman desire to have the bill and report printed in the RECORD?

Mr. ADAMSON. I should like to print the bill and the report in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does this include the printing of the views of the minority in the RECORD?

Mr. ADAMSON. They can ask that when they present the views of the minority, which have not yet been presented. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that the views of the minority will be presented through the box.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; but I have no objection to the printing in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the bill and report be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Reserving the right to object, is it understood that there will be no objection to the printing of the views of the minority in the RECORD also?

Mr. ADAMSON. There is no objection at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the Panama Canal bill, together with the report of the majority and the views of the minority, be printed in the RECORD, and that the minority have five legislative days in which to file their views. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill and report are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Be it enacted, etc., That the zone of land and land under water of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal now being constructed thereon, which zone begins in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extends to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to the distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, excepting and excluding therefrom the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors located within said zone, as excepted in the treaty with the Republic of Panama dated November 18, 1903, but including all islands within said described zone, and in addition thereto the group of islands in the Bay of Panama named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Falmenco, and any lands and waters outside of said limits above described which are necessary or convenient or from time to time may become necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals, lakes, or other works necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of said canal, the use, occupancy, or control whereof were granted to the United States by the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 26th day of February, 1904, shall be known and designated as the Canal Zone, and the canal now being constructed thereon shall hereafter be known and designated as the Panama Canal. The President is authorized ot acquire by treaty with the Republic of Panama any additional land or land under water not already granted, or which was excepted from the grant, that he may deem necessary for the operation, maintenance, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and may, in like manner, exchange any land or land under water not deemed necessary for such purposes for other land or land under water which may be deemed necessary for such purposes, which additional land or land under water so acquired shall become part of the Canal Zone.

SEC. 2. That all laws, orders, regulations, and ordinances adopted and promulgated in the Canal Zone by order of the President for the government and sanitation of the Canal Zone and the construction of the Panama Canal are hereby ratified and confirmed as valid and binding until Congress shall otherwise provide. The existing courts established in the Canal Zone by Executive order are recognized and confirmed to continue in operation until Congress shall otherwise provide.

SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to declare by Executive order that all land and land under water within the limits of the Canal Zone is necessary for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and to extinguish, by agreement when advisable, all claims and titles of adverse claimants and occupants. Upon failure to secure by agreement title to any such parcel of land or land under water the adverse claim or occupancy shall be disposed of and title thereto secured in the United States and compensation therefor fixed and paid in the manner provided in the aforesaid treaty with the Republic of Panama, or such modification of such treaty as may hereafter be made.

SEC. 4. That when in the judgment of the President the construction of the Panama Canal shall be sufficiently advanced toward completion to render the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission unnecessary the President is authorized by Executive order to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission, which, together with the present organization, shall then cease to exist; and the President is authorized thereafter to complete and operate the Panama Canal or cause it to be completed and operated through a governor of the Panama Canal and such other persons as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, care, maintenance, sanitation, operation, and protection of the canal. The governor of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned for a term of four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified. He shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. Vacancies shall be filled in the same manner, except that in the recess of the Senate the President may make an ad interim appointment. All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, and operation of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, removable at his pleasure, with salaries to be fixed by him. That upon the completion of the Panama Canal the President shall cause the same to be officially and formally opened for use and operation.

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe, and from time to time change, toll charges for the use of the Panama Canal by all vessels, except those belonging to the Government of the United States (including those of the Panama Railroad Co.) and the Government of the Republic of Panama, which excepted vessels shall be charged no tolls. Charges may be based upon gross or net registered tonnage, displacement tonnage, or otherwise, and may be based on one form of tonnage for warships and another for ships of commerce, but the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per ton, based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce, nor be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal: Provided, however, That under regulations prescribed by the President a vessel paying toll going through the canal in ballast shall, on its return trip through the canal laden with cargo, be entitled to receive a rebate of 50 per cent of the tolls just previously paid going through in the opposite direction without cargo. No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, other than vessels belonging to the Government of the United States (including those belonging to the Panama Railroad Co.) and the Government of the Republic of Panama, observing the rules and regulations of the Panama Canal. The toll for each passenger shall be not more than $1.50. The President is authorized to make, and from time to time amend, regulations governing the operation of the Panama Canal and the passage and control of vessels passing through the same or any part thereof, including the locks and approaches thereto, and all rules and regulations affecting lighting, pilots, and pilotage in the canal or the approaches thereto through the adjacent waters.

Such rules and regulations shall expressly deny and forbid the use of the Panama Canal to all the classes of vessels the passage of which through the Panama Canal, or any part thereof, is made and declared unlawful by section 11 of this act.

Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from alleged injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers from the passing of vessels through the locks under the control of those operating them under such rules and regulations. In case of disagreement, suit may be brought in the district court of the Canal Zone against the governor of the Panama Canal. The hearing and disposition of such cases shall be expedited and the judgment shall be immediately paid off without proceeding to execution. All such claims, whether by agreement or after judgment, shall be paid out of any moneys appropriated or allotted for canal operation.

SEC. 6. That the President is authorized to cause to be erected, maintained, and operated, at suitable places along the Panama Canal and the coast adjacent to its two terminals, in connection with the operation of said canal, such wireless telegraphic installations as he may deem necessary for the operation, maintenance, sanitation, and protection of said canal. If it is found necessary to locate such installations upon territory of the Republic of Panama, the President is authorized to make such agreement with said Government as may be necessary, and also to provide for the acceptance and transmission, by said system, of all private and commercial messages, and those of the Government of Panama, on such terms and for such tolls as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the messages of the Government of the United States and the departments thereof, and the management of the Panama Canal, shall always be given precedence over all other messages. The President is also authorized to establish, maintain, and operate dry docks, repairs shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other necessary facilities and appurtenances for the purpose of providing coal and other materials, labor, repairs, and supplies for its own vessels, and, incidentally, for supplying such at reasonable prices to passing vessels, in accordance with appropriations hereby authorized to be made from time to time by Congress as a part of the maintenance and operation of the said canal. Moneys received in the ordinary course of business from the conduct of said business may be expended and reinvested for such purposes without being covered into the Treasury of the United States; and such moneys are hereby appropriated for such purposes, but all deposits of such funds shall be subject to the provisions of existing law relating to the deposit of other public funds of the United States, and any net profits accruing from such business shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States. Monthly reports of such receipts and expenditures shall be made to the President by the persons in charge, and annual reports shall be made to the Congress.

SEC. 7. That the governor of the Panama Canal shall, in connection with the operation of such canal, have official control and jurisdiction over the Canal Zone and shall perform all duties in connection with the civil government of the Canal Zone, which is to be held, treated, and governed as an adjunct of such Panama Canal. Unless in this act otherwise provided all existing laws of the Canal Zone referring to the civil governor or the civil administration of the Canal Zone shall be applicable to the governor of the Panama Canal, who shall perform all such executive and administrative duties required by existing law. The President is authorized to determine or cause to be determined what towns shall exist in the Canal Zone and subdivide said Canal Zone into subdivisions, to be designated by name or number, so that there shall be situated one town in each subdivision, and the boundaries of each subdivision shall be clearly defined. In each town there shall be a magistrate's court with exclusive original jurisdiction coextensive with the subdivision in which it is situated of all civil cases of every character in which the principal sum claimed does not exceed $300, and all criminal cases wherein the fine that can be imposed could not exceed $25, imprisonment could not exceed 30 days, or both, and all violations of police regulations and ordinances and all actions involving possession or title to personal property or the forcible entry and detainer of real estate, and all other matters and proceedings which are now within the jurisdiction of the municipal judge or the municipal courts. Such magistrates shall also hold preliminary investigations in charges of felony and commit or bail in bailable cases to the district court. A sufficient number of magistrates and constables, who must be citizens of the United States, to conduct the business of such courts, shall be appointed by the governor of the Panama Canal for terms of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified with salaries to be fixed by the President. The rules governing said courts and prescribing the duties of said magistrates and constables, oaths and bonds, the times and places of holding such courts, the disposition of fines, costs, forfeitures, enforcements of judgments, appeals therefrom to the district court, and the disposition, treatment, and pardon of misdemeanor convicts shall be established by order of the President. The governor of the Panama Canal shall appoint all notaries public, prescribe their powers and duties, their official seal, and the fees to be charged and collected by them.

SEC. 8. That there shall be in the Canal Zone one district court with two divisions, one including Balboa and the other including Cristobal; and one district judge of the said district, who shall hold his court in both divisions at such time as he may designate by order, at least once a month in each division. The rules of practice in such district court shall be prescribed or amended by order of the President. The said district court shall have original jurdisdiction of all felony cases and of all causes in equity and admiralty and all cases at law involving principal sums exceeding $300 and of all appeals from judgments rendered in magistrates' courts. The jurisdiction in admiralty herein conferred upon the district judge and the district court shall be the same that is exercised by the United States district judges and the United States district courts, and the procedure and practice shall also be the same. The district judge shall also have jurisdiction of all other matters and proceedings not herein provided for which are now within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, of the Circuit Court of the Canal Zone, or the District Court of the Canal Zone, or the judges thereof. Said judge shall provide for the selection, summoning, serving, and compensation of jurors from among the citizens of the United States, to be subject to jury duty in either division of such district, and a jury shall be had in any criminal case or civil case at law originating in said court on the demand of either party. There shall be a district attorney and a marshal for said court. It shall be the duty of the district attorney to conduct all business, civil and criminal, for the Government, and to advise the governor of the Panama Canal on all legal questions touching the operation of the canal and the administration of civil affairs. It shall be the duty of the marshal to execute all process of the court, preserve order therein, and do all things incident to the office of marshal. The district judge, the district attorney, and the marshal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of four years each, or until their successors are appointed and qualified, and during their terms of office shall reside within the Canal Zone, and shall hold no other office nor serve on any official board or commission nor receive any emoluments except their salaries. The district judge shall receive the same salary paid the district judges of the United States, and shall appoint the clerk of said court, who shall receive a salary to be fixed by the President. The district judge shall be entitled to six weeks' leave of absence each year with pay. During his absence or during any period of disability or disqualification from sickness or otherwise to discharge his duties the same shall be temporarily performed by any circuit or district judge of the United States who may be designated by the President, and who, during such service, shall receive the additional mileage and per diem allowed by law to district judges of the United States when holding court away from their homes. The district attorney and the marshal shall be paid each a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 9. That the records of the existing courts and all causes, proceedings, and criminal prosecutions pending therein as shown by the dockets thereof, except as herein otherwise provided, shall immediately upon the organization of the courts created by this act be transferred to such new courts having jurisdiction of like cases, be entered upon the dockets thereof, and proceed as if they had originally been brought therein, whereupon all the existing courts, except the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, shall cease to exist. The President may continue the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone and retain the judges thereof in office for such time as to him may seem necessary to determine finally any causes and proceedings which may be pending therein. All laws of the Canal Zone imposing duties upon the clerks or ministerial officers of existing courts shall apply and impose such duties upon the clerks and ministerial officers of the new courts created by this act having jurisdiction of like cases, matters, and duties.

All existing laws in the Canal Zone governing practice and procedure in existing courts shall be applicable and adapted to the practice and procedure in the new courts.

The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, modify, reverse, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the district court of the Canal Zone and to render such judgments as in the opinion of the said appellate court should have been rendered by the trial court in all actions and proceedings in which the Constitution, or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United States, is involved and a right thereunder denied, and in cases in which the value in controversy exceeds $1,000, or which involves the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of $1,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party, or by other competent evidence, and also in criminal causes wherein the offense charged is punishable as a felony. And such appellate jurisdiction may be exercised by said circuit court of appeals in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure as nearly as practicable as is done in reviewing the final judgments and decrees of the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 10. That after the Panama Canal shall have been completed and opened for operation it shall not be lawful for any person to go, be, or remain upon or pass over any part of the Canal Zone without the permission of the governor of the Panama Canal, except United States soldiers, sailors, and marines and their officers, and the employees operating the Panama Canal. Any person violating this provision shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction in the magistrate's court of the subdivision in which the violation occurred shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. It shall be unlawful for any person, by any means or in any way, to injure or obstruct, or attempt to injure or obstruct, any part of the Panama Canal or the locks thereof or the approaches thereto. Any person violating this provision shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction in the District Court of the Canal Zone shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, or both, in the discretion of the court. If the act shall cause the death of any person within a year and a day thereafter, the person so convicted shall be guilty of murder and shall be punished accordingly.

SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1913, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

That section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"Within three months after the taking effect of this act any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce which, alone or in connection with any other common carrier, transports passengers or property in connection with a water carrier to or from a foreign country from or to any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia and makes or participates in joint through rates for such transportation, shall, upon the request of any water carrier engaged in the lake, river, or coastwise trade of the United States, including trade through the Panama Canal, provide like port facilities, connections, and joint through rates from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia for and in connection with such water carrier; and the charge for such share of such joint through rate shall be no greater sum of money than such common carrier alone, or in connection with any other common carrier, receives for the same service for transportation of passengers or property in connection with any water carrier to or from a foreign country from or to any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia."

SEC. 12. That all laws and treaties relating to the extradition of persons accused of crime in force in the United States, to the extent that they may not be in conflict with or superseded by any special treaty entered into between the United States and the Republic of Panama with respect to the Canal Zone, and all laws relating to the rendition of fugitives from justice as between the several States and Territories of the United States, shall extend to and be considered in force in the Canal Zone, and for such purposes and such purposes only the Canal Zone shall be considered and treated as an organized Territory of the United States.

SEC. 13. That in time of war in which the United States shall be engaged, or when, in the opinion of the President, war is imminent, such officer of the Army as the President may designate shall, upon the order of the President, assume and have exclusive authority and jurisdiction over the operation of the Panama Canal and all of its adjuncts, appendants, and appurtenances, including the entire control and government of the Canal Zone, and during a continuance of such condition the governor of the Panama Canal shall, in all respects and particulars as to the operation of such Panama Canal, and all duties, matters, and transactions affecting the Canal Zone, be subject to the order and direction of such officer of the Army.

SEC. 14. That this act shall be known as, and referred to as, the Panama Canal Act.

[House Report No. 423, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 21969:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The Panama Canal is unique in all respects, and at every stage presents novel problems. Its initiation involved intricate questions, requiring skillful diplomacy and tactful legislation. Its construction encountered untried difficulties and invented original methods and processes without the aid of model or previous suggestion. Likewise, legislation to operate and govern the gigantic institution, with its adjuncts and incidents, must, in the absence of precedent, rely upon basic principles, with analogy and reason as the only guide.

As there was no available route for the construction of the canal through our own territory, and under the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were prevented from constructing a Government-owned canal at public expense for use of the Government, we were compelled, first, to secure a modification of the treaty, which authorized us, under stipulated conditions, to arrange with some Central American Government for the route and terms of constructing such a canal. Then Congress passed the canal act, pursuant to which the Canal Zone was acquired through a treaty establishing the mutual and reciprocal rights and obligations to obtain between the United States and the Republic of Panama, mentioning and adopting the essential features of our modified treaty with Great Britain.

Section 1: This section of the bill describes and names the Canal Zone and the Panama Canal in accordance with the aforesaid treaties and the canal act, and also authorizes the President to acquire, by treaty, jurisdiction over any additional territory which may be found necessary to effectuate the purposes of the original grant. This may be necessary in connection with the harbor lines about Colon and the boundaries between Colon and the Canal Zone, Colon having been exempted from the grant.

Section 2: This section is intended to ratify and confirm existing laws and organizations under which the Canal Zone is governed and the canal is being constructed. The existing judicial system is likewise recognized and confirmed. While not regarded as absolutely essential, all this is deemed appropriate for the reason that at the end of the Fifty-eighth Congress, in default of renewed legislation, the law for the temporary government lapsed, and the President not only preserved the status established under the temporary provision but also extended and continued the exercise of all necessary authority and functions of government de facto in so far and whenever necessary authority was found not to have been conferred by the canal act and various subsequent acts of Congress. The committee approves of the course pursued by the Executive and recommends legislative approval thereof as appropriate.

Section 3: This section provides for acquiring title and possession of all lands in the Canal Zone not already acquired by the United States. It is not thought advisable for sanitary purposes to permit any permanent population in that part of the Canal Zone between the two dams which make the summit level, nor is it safe to permit unfriendly or uncertain population in the neghborhood of the canal. Very little land suitable for habitation or cultivation will be left unflooded when the lakes and the summit level are filled with water. In fact, there will be no more available land than may be required for barracks, exercise and drill grounds, and other purposes connected with maintaining such military police as may be necessary. It should be observed that our authority and qualified sovereignty over such canal is limited by the canal act and by treaty to such territory as is necessary to the construction, sanitation, maintenance, operation, and protection of such canal. If we now have or should hereafter acquire authority and deem it wise to colonize the zone, we at least have the right in all events to acquire the property rights and possession and hold all the lands until we open the canal and put it in operation. Then we can be guided by developments in determining our policy in the premises.

Section 4: We now come to the second division of the bill. As the canal nears completion the working force is gradually decreased. In order to secure the best results it is wise to select, retain, and train for the operation of the canal those employees who may be found best suited therefor. By that means a competent force to man the locks and operate the canal will be present and available when the canal is ready to be opened and all the other employees shall have been discharged and returned to their homes. To this end the President is authorized, when in his opinion advisable, to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission and relieve from duty the present organization. It is not contemplated by the committee that this will involve the separation from the service before the canal is finished of any of the eminent engineer heads of divisions nor the illustrious head of the sanitary department nor the very efficient chief subsistence and commissary officials. In fact, we have reason to believe that all these illustrious officials are acceptable to the administration, that their services are desired, and will not be dispensed with though the commission should be abolished. While we deem it wise to vest the operation of the canal in a single responsible head and make the President himself responsible for the conduct of affairs, it is believed that Congress should retain control over the appointment, conduct, and term of office and salary of the governor of the Panama Canal by requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to the selection of that officer and providing a definite tenure of office. In a subsequent section a similar provision is applied to the district judge, the district attorney, and the marshal. It seems to be the opinion of experts familiar with the subject who appeared before the committee that it is not only safe and expedient but also essential to securing the best results that plenary authority over the appointment, salary, service, and removal of all other employees of every degree be vested in the President. This section also provides that upon the completion of the canal the President shall cause it to be officially and formally opened for use and operation, the details of which are left to his discretion.

Section 5: This section authorizes the President to fix and change toll charges, not to exceed $1.25 per ton based on net registered tonnage nor be less than the proportionate part of the estimated cost for maintenance and operation. As to vessels of war, tolls may be based on a different form of tonnage, but it is intended that a substantial equivalent shall be fixed for the tolls. Under rules to be prescribed by the President, who is vested with authority to provide all regulations, a ship in ballast paying tolls may, on its return laden with cargo, be refunded 50 per cent of the tolls paid when empty. The tolls for each passenger shall be not more than $1.50. The President is also authorized to prescribe regulations as to lighting, pilots, and pilotage in the canal or the approaches thereto. This section requires that tolls shall be imposed and operate uniformly without preference of discrimination upon all vessels of all peoples and all nations, except vessels belonging to the Government of Panama and the Government of the United States, which include those of the Panama Railroad, all the stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States. These exceptions are made because the "United States enjoys all the rights incident to construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." As such it is entitled to all the benefits and profits resulting from ownership and operation thereof. As tolls paid out of the common Treasury would instantly return to the same common Treasury, such performance would be entirely useless, and in the exercise of common sense will be omitted. We charge other vessels because it is our canal and our service. We pass those belonging to our own Government free because the canal belongs to the Government. The ship and the tolls also belong to the Government. The exemption covers the ships belonging to the Government of Panama because, under the facts and the terms of the treaty with her, which by our treaties with Great Britain we were authorized to make, she became a quasi party to the construction and operation. The canal traversing that Republic we could construct only by making terms with the Republic of Panama with conditions imposed in terms, which render her situation akin and analogous to a constructor of the canal. Without her consent it could not have been done, and the exemption of her Government-owned ships conforms to both treaties, and fairly and rightly so.

While many members of our committee believe that by the terms of our treaties with Great Britain we are prevented from allowing preferential or free tolls to ships of American registry, either coastwise or foreign, the majority of the committee voting for uniform tolls authorize, and request the statement—positive, plain, and unequivocal—that no language of this section was chosen or used for the purpose of foreclosing discussion and differing opinions on that question. They authorize the express affirmation that this provision is adopted for present use, disclaiming all intention to declare in this section any construction of the language of the treaty or to establish any precedent or permanent legislative policy or to bind any future Congress should it be deemed expedient or adjudged competent to adopt a different basis. This statement of the committee may be clearly understood by reference to the original and committee prints of the bill, from which the committee adopting this section eliminated all reference to treaties. The language beginning on page 6 with the words "No preference shall be given," etc., which has been criticized as an attempt to construe the treaty and thereby estop us from future consideration of the question, was not quoted from the treaty at all, but was taken from bills introduced by advocates of free or preferential tolls. One containing the same language has been introduced by the leading champion and signer of the minority views. Not deeming it necessary at this time nor for this purpose to make a legislative declaration as to the construction of that part of the treaty, the majority of the committee recommend uniform tolls for reasons which they regard as good and sufficient. First, the financial success of the canal is of prime importance, and its operation is the main object of this bill. Financial returns in the beginning are in doubt. The operation of the canal will be not only experimental, but the patronage and revenues are conjectural. We know it will require $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 a year to maintain and operate the canal and administer its adjuncts. English capitalists are large stockholders in the Suez Canal, and also in the leading ships and ship lines belonging to English subjects. Some of them are directors in the canal and ship companies. The same is true of several other leading European countries. It is therefore taken for granted that time, distance, and cost of operating being anything like equal, most of the ships of those countries will adopt the Suez route.

There is prospect of very little traffic within the competitive or twilight zone. To reduce the level of tolls low enough to secure that traffic might forfeit more revenue certain to be derived from territory naturally belonging to the Panama traffic. Much of that competitive traffic, unless unreasonably low tolls are fixed, will take the route by the Cape of Good Hope or through Magellan or around Cape Horn, thus avoiding tolls entirely. If the maximum toll rate is prescribed it will be about 6 cents per ton under the Suez rate, but the Suez rate will probably soon be reduced to $1, which we will have to meet. There will undoubtedly be some shipping through the canal between our Atlantic coast and the Orient, and some between Europe and the Pacific coast, as well as occasional vessels between Europe and various Pacific ports not touching at American ports at all. Our own coastwise ships and Canadian coastwise ships may constitute the great body of that Panama traffic which is at all certain. The majority of the committee believe that for the first few years we will need the tolls of all these ships and that it is right and just to open the canal and demonstrate what the financial returns will be and what success we will realize in securing and handling traffic before taking up the question of exempting any vessels. We also believe that in opening so vast an enterprise we have that right in order to justify its construction and existence by operating it for awhile untrammeled and unshackled by any other issues and interests. We love the American flag and desire the prosperity of American shipping. Most of us disapprove of the methods by which our foreign shipping was driven from the ocean, but Congress is here always and can adopt methods to restore the shipping without hampering the canal operation with that problem. If American ships need the aid of Government, either in foreign or coastwise trade, it ought to be considered as an independent proposition, entirely divorced from the canal subject, so as to avoid all embarrassment in the management of that great project. It is neither fair nor wise to attach the proposition as a condition of canal operation, when separate bills can deal with the matter at any time, expressing the will of Congress much more fairly and distributing the assistance provided by extending it to all coastwise ships rather than by limiting it to the small per cent of them which will go through the canal. We found from the hearings that the coastwise ships which will pass through the canal do not need the remission of the tolls.

Some promoters and speculators, tickling the cupidity of financiers who wish to finance new enterprises, are willing to build new ships provided the Government in advance will assure them bounty or subsidy to the amount of the tolls. Not satisfied with that and the advantages of an exclusive monopoly of the coastwise business, they suggest still other concessions and gratuities from the Government, and have sent out flashing prospectuses of the immense profit promised by the operation of their new ships by the grace of the Government through preferential tolls, and solicit subscriptions for stock with assurances of tremendous dividends. Several companies are already doing an extensive coastwise business with a large number of ships, and some of them building additional ships. They are all prosperous. Many of their ships will use the canal to the full extent justified by the traffic, and there will never be wanting ships to do the business if traffic invites. The shortening of distance and time of voyages will insure such reduction in coast-to-coast freight rates as to render the small toll charges we authorize immaterial as affecting competition by the transcontinental railroads or by the Magellan or Cape Horn route unless the coastwise ships themselves keep up the freight rates through the canal. In that event the tolls would alike be immaterial. The operators of coastwise ships and ship lines are very shifty and discreet. They have an eye ever open to the main chance, just like foreign ships and interstate railroads. Of course, it is purely by accident and through inadvertence that they never get in one another's way. Although human, they would scorn combinations. In fact, combinations are unnecessary as well as bad. But these ship companies somehow contrive that lines grow up between certain ports and other lines grow up between other ports, each route between two ports being served by a different line of ships from those running between two other ports, so that it is very rare that any two ports are embarrassed by having to choose between two lines or two ships competing for their business. It is even said that sometimes an irresistible longing arises, spontaneous, it is true, but almost as unerring as if by compulsion, to limit the patronage of the business men of a port to a particular line without encouraging any other. These companies frankly admit that the same courtesy and prudence will be observed among them as to running ships through the Panama Canal.

We further believe that, whether a governmental gratuity is considered as a charity to an unprofitable and dying business or as a bounty to prosperous shipping, the Government should in fairness treat all of the same class alike. All interstate coastwise ships are important. The cities of the Atlantic coast interchange more business with one another than will ever go through both the Panama and the Suez Canals. More business now passes through the Soo Canal between the Great Lakes than will ever patronize both the Panama and the Suez Canals. The coastwise traffic between the Pacific coast cities that will never pass through the canal at all is very important. Ninety per cent of the coastwise ships, busy all the time in interstate business, will never approach the canal at all. Less than 10 per cent of all these coastwise ships will use the canal, making longer journeys, charging correspondingly more freight and passenger rates, and making infinitely more money, yet it is selfishly demanded that those few ships (for only a few will be needed) shall be given their tolls in the interests of interstate trade, while the 90 per cent rendering service just as valuable in interstate commerce would not participate in the contribution. When we go to voting away the Government's money and credit to special interests, we prefer some method more fair and equitable. This small shipping interest has secured indorsements and recommendations from some trade organizations in various coast cities of the country on the erroneous theory that shippers would secure the benefits of the remitted tolls through reduced freight rates. This is a delusion, pure and simple, as we have already shown It is also demonstrated by history, observation, and experience. But suppose the shippers did secure the benefit of the remitted tolls. They would not and could not pass it to their customers. It would be impossible of division, apportionment, and distribution among them. Being impossible, it is admittedly never attempted. Only a small per cent of the American people will ship freight in considerable quantities through the canal. It is a catchy phrase, plausible, sophistical, and misleading, that "we can use our canal for our own benefit," which is the slogan of the small special interest demanding preferential tolls.

In principle and theory the Government and the people are identical and their interests the same. But the 1 per cent or less of our population financially interested in ships can hardly be regarded as identical with the whole people nor the sole beneficiaries of the Treasury. All the people own the Treasury, and the Treasury may be replenished by compulsory contributions from all the people. We may rightfully appropriate from the Treasury for the benefit of all the people, but giving public funds to special interests would be an unauthorized diversion, and in politics and morals amount to a misappropriation of the people's money. But it is said that it is so easy just to remit the tolls before they go into the Treasury. It amounts to the same thing as taking it out of the Treasury, where all the tolls belong, and we should not divert any from going in. It is different from prohibitory tariff protection which establishes a condition for transacting business. It is different from excluding foreign competition from the coastwise trade, practiced, not for the reason that, incidentally, it helps to enrich shipowners, but in the interests of sound public policy, not always, however, realized, that aliens should not operate in our domestic commerce and become familiar with our internal affairs. That exclusion also stops with making a condition for highly profitable business. But the remission or refunding of tolls means taking money already ascertained to belong to all the people and giving it to a favored few. It is also urged that remission should be allowed because it is apprehended that some foreign nations may pay tolls for their ships. We can not understand how that can affect the coastwise ships at all, inasmuch as no foreign ship can participate in the coastwise trade. At once the most plausible and most erroneous contention is that the canal being an American waterway it would be a departure from our traditional policy of free waterways if we should charge tolls for coastwise ships. Based on false premises, that argument proves too much. If the canal is a purely domestic waterway we should not charge tolls to any vessel. There is no discrimination in the use of American waterways. Ships of all nationalities may use them alike. As shown in the beginning of this report, the Panama Canal is in a foreign country, our authority to construct and operate the canal with certain limitations and conditions was secured by treaties with two foreign countries, and we must act within those limitations and conditions.

There are two other canals which we use under treaty stipulations with our neighbor to the north—the Welland Canal, built and operated by Canada, and the Soo Canal, built and operated by us. Those two canals are on the line between the two countries. No tolls are charged on either; not because they are American canals or Canadian canals, but because mutual and reciprocal treaty stipulations provide that both shall be free. If the Panama Canal is an American waterway, so is the Soo; and it is equally true that the Welland is a Canadian waterway. The use of all depends on treaties. There is nothing in our treaty, however, to forbid universal remission of all tolls; but under the existing circumstances it would be an unwise thing to do and could hardly be expected to receive the approval of the American people. While they wish to be fair and honorable, they do not feel called upon to operate the Panama Canal as an eleemosynary institution. While the majority of the committee based action favoring universal tolls upon economic reasons and financial necessity, expressly disclaiming any purpose or attempt to construe the toll references in the treaty, yet the terms of the treaty remain of force and must be remembered and regarded until modified or set aside. It is urged that the stipulations for equality do not prevent preference for coastwise ships, because they are not in competition with foreign ships, which can not enter coastwise trade. In effect, the argument is that, being already protected against competition, one discrimination in their favor demands another. Being protected against all competition, they would be also exempt from tolls and place in their coffers the amount saved thereby. We think the treaty stipulations for equality of treatment mean treatment at the canal and nothing else. It is limited to "conditions and charges of traffic," which "conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." By that stipulation we are bound to levy such charges and establish and maintain such conditions of traffic at the canal as in those respects only will maintain it "free and open without discrimination in these respects."

We are not permitted to consider discrimination made in other respects and elsewhere in connection with the shipping of any country, but are bound by the language and intent of the treaties to preserve fairness and equality without discrimination in respect of "conditions and charges of traffic" at the canal; therefore, the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332), relied on by the advocates of preferential tolls, can have no application to the situation with which we are dealing. Whether two ships of diverse nationality are treated alike or differently in the home ports of either can have no effect or bearing on our treaty obligations to treat them both alike at the canal as to charges and conditions of traffic.

We are neither required nor authorized to use the canal nor its operation as a pretext to attempt the regulation of the commerce of the world nor meddle with any details or conditions of trade away from the canal. There are other methods of dealing with all other subjects. The highest authorities among the advocates of Government aid to domestic ships have recognized that fact by recommending that tolls be collected and refunded, and bills have been introduced for the purpose of refunding its tolls. Let those bills be considered as separate propositions. The only parties as yet to the treaties under which the canal is being constructed are Great Britain, the Republic of Panama, and the United States. If, under the treaty, our ships can be allowed preferential tolls, the other two parties to the treaties will claim similar consideration. If, as we believe, the treaties do not permit such treatment, it is highly probable that both England and Panama would consent to such modification as would permit it. The territory of Panama, as that of Canada, extends from coast to coast, just as in our own case, and both Canada and Panama have coastwise trade and coastwise vessels. With such a modification it would be possible, if our Government wished to inaugurate such an unfair system—that is, unfair to our own citizens—to adopt preferential tolls on such terms as may be provided by the modified treaty. Then the great majority of the ships of the world could and would, easily and promptly, enter the coastwise trade of Canada, the United States, or Panama. As coastwise ships are not prohibited from extending their activities into the foreign trade, the ships of these three countries would immediately monopolize the use of the canal and it would automatically become a free canal. There would be no competing ships to pay the tolls. It may be interesting to note that when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending in the Senate, December 13, 1900, the following amendment was proposed:

"Strike out article 3 and substitute 'The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.'"

The amendment was rejected on roll call—yeas 27, nays 43.

Those who demand this preference make protestations of patriotism and love for the flag both loud and profuse, but those professions are all that they offer for the largess demanded, and experience demonstrates that they would do business under a foreign flag just as readily if more profits were guaranteed thereby. No quid pro quo in the shape of valuable consideration is tendered in return for the concession claimed. There is no offer to carry free for the Government its men or supplies or munitions of war or any kind of freight or passengers. For all that full pay, if not more, is expected from the Government. The only pretense at offering a return for the preference demanded is that in case of war the Government would have the option to buy the subsidized vessels at a high price. If the Government refused to pay the price demanded, arbitration would be relied on to fix a price high enough to satisfy the most aggravated cupidity. As all the optimistic doctrinaires and publicists prophesy a long period of peace, and in view of the fact that the most modern and up-to-date ships go out of fashion and become obsolete in a few years, this proposition offers little inducement for intelligent and faithful Representatives to vote tolls away from the Treasury. It is not probable that the United States will ever find itself in such emergent condition that with the cash it can not purchase such ships, both chief and auxiliary, as it may need—ships fully adapted to its purpose and in sufficient numbers. The demand for discrimination in favor of American ships presents a square issue between a small fraction of the coastwise shipping interests and the entire population of the United States. The question which our committee decides in the negative, practically and substantially stated, is, Shall we, as representatives of the people, take from them, without consideration, return, or recompense, their money and give it to the small special interests operating but a small per cent of the coastwise trade, who have no right to the money and do not need it, as their business is prosperous—certainly do not need it more than the other 90 per cent of the coastwise trade against whom the discrimination in refusing to divide the subsidy with them would be as gross as the discrimination claimed against the people who in the aggregate are as patriotic as those few claiming preference?

Reference is had in this section to prescribing rules for the enforcement of section 11, which will be further discussed in connection with that section. It is also provided in section 5 that the rules prescribed shall permit and require prompt adjustment and settlement for injuries sustained by vessels which the canal management will take in charge and carry through the locks. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of the locks, as well as of the vessel, that it should be under the entire control and handled exclusively by the canal authorities through the locks. It is only right that, in case the canal authorities should commit any injury an ample and adequate arrangement should be provided for prompt reparation. If accord and satisfaction fail to adjust the case, the claimant may sue the governor of the Panama Canal in the district court, which must expedite the proceedings to an early conclusion.

Section 6: This section authorizes the President to install necessary wireless stations and is drawn in accordance with the desire of the Government and the departments chiefly concerned in the wireless installation. This section also authorizes the President to establish and operate dry docks, repair shops, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other facilities for accommodating commerce and navigation and supplying material, labor, and repairs, and all kinds of ship stores, primarily, of course, for the use of our own vessels, but incidentally to supply, at reasonable prices, passing vessels. It being absolutely necessary to provide for the necessities of our own ships, it is regarded as an excellent inducement to entice travel and traffic to use the Panama route. We already have valuable plants for supplying a great many of these facilities. To abandon them and rely upon other methods of supplying our own ships would entail great loss, and we might suffer great inconvenience in securing supplies. If we should utilize that facility and convenience to make the Panama route attractive to vessels of commerce and of war, the supply must be certain and reliable. The quality must be good and the prices known to be reasonable. Furnishing those facilities will present an instance illustrating what the treaty means by conditions of traffic. If one of the conditions of traffic through the canal is to be furnishing supplies and repairs, they must be furnished to all vessels alike on demand, without discrimination or preference. This section also prescribes the manner of bookkeeping, making reports, reinvesting funds, and depositing the net profits.

Section 7: With section 6 the bill might appropriately end, as it will probably be three years and several sessions of Congress will convene before the canal is put in operation, but for the necessity of transforming and reducing the present force into a small and efficient operating force and the fact that the present organization, including the Canal Commission, is to be discontinued, which will carry out of existence the civil government and judicial system, therefore it is not premature at this time to prescribe the method of transition from the existing régime to the new system of management, civil control, and judicial courts and procedure. Accordingly, we provide in this section that when, in the fullness of time, the change is made from the present organization to the new that the new system shall be in shape ready for the transition of conditions and the changed organization and system. It is not intended that there shall be much population in the Canal Zone, and it shall be of a high order. American citizens of high character employed to operate the canal, with their families, together with soldiers, sailors, and marines, and their officers, will be the only constant residents. Authorized tourists and visitors will also be people of good character. So it is confidently believed that the civil government and judicial system may be of a simple, limited, and economical kind. In order to secure homogeneous authority and uniform administration, we recommend that the governor of the Panama Canal shall exercise all authority as governor of the Canal Zone, which is declared to be merely an adjunct thereof. The section also provides for the subdivision of the Canal Zone into territorial jurisdictions of magistrates' courts, which shall have jurisdiction of all minor offenses and of civil cases in sums not exceeding $300, with right of appeal. It provides for the appointment of constables; defines the duties and jurisdiction of the magistrates and constables; gives the magistrates jurisdiction of possessory warrants, trover cases, forcible entry and detainer, and preliminary trials. The magistrates and constables must be citizens of the United States, and the President shall prescribe the rules of the court, oaths, bonds, times and places of holding court, disposition of fines, costs, forfeitures, enforcing judgments, appeals therefrom, and the disposition, treatment, and pardon of misdemeanor convicts. It also provides for the appointment of notaries public.

Section 8: This section would establish a district court in the Canal Zone, to be held in two divisions, one at each terminal of the canal, and defines the jurisdiction of the court, the powers, duties, and salary of the judge thereof, which include appeals from the magistrates' courts, and all cases, civil and criminal, above the jurisdiction of the magistrate's court. It is expected, however, that the principal business before the district court and the district judge will be causes in equity and admiralty. A clerk, marshal, and district attorney are provided for this court by this section. The rules of practice are to be prescribed by the President, but the district judge shall make provision for juries in said court. In addition to his other duties the district attorney will advise the governor of the Panama Canal on all legal questions touching the operation of the canal and the administration of civil affairs. The district attorney and marshal as well as the district judge are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of four years each. They must reside within the Canal Zone and hold no other office nor receive any other emoluments than their salaries. The section fixes for the district judge the same salary received by district judges in the United States and the salaries of the district attorney and the marshal at $5,000 each. Provision is made for six weeks' leave of absence each year for the judge and for the discharge of his duties during his absence, disability, or disqualification. A jury may be had on the demand of either party in any criminal case or case at law. The admiralty jurisdiction conferred and the procedure and practice shall be the same as that in force before the district judges and district courts of the United States.

Section 9: This section provides for the transfer of the records of existing courts, with all pending causes, proceedings, and criminal prosecutions, to the new courts created by this act as soon as they are organized, and abolishes all existing courts, except the supreme court of the Canal Zone, which the President may permit to exist until all pending causes are disposed of. Jurisdiction is given to the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit of the United States to review certain cases, actions, and proceedings determined by the district court of the Canal Zone under certain limitations and restrictions.

Section 10: This section provides necessary protection for the canal itself, and its importance can not be overestimated. It excludes from the Canal Zone all persons having no permission from the governor of the Panama Canal except United States soldiers, sailors, and marines and their officers, and the employees of the United States operating the canal. It likewise defines and prohibits injuring or obstructing or attempting to injure or obstruct any part of the Panama Canal, the locks thereof, or the approaches thereto, and provides adequate punishment for each of such crimes.

Section 11: Believing that the function of the canal management to maintain equality and fairness in respect of conditions and charges of traffic is limited to the operation and supply and must be applied at the canal itself, and there only, without attempting to adjust inequalities or equalize conditions in different countries of the world, the committee nevertheless recognizes that the coast-to-coast business through the canal, under existing navigation laws, will be a part of our coastwise trade. It is competent in this or an independent bill to legislate concerning coastwise traffic. It would not be fair to discriminate among our coastwise vessels, all of which are important. The apprehension of railroad-owned vessels driving competition from the canal may or may not be exaggerated, but it is certain that the evil, which is only anticipated there, already exists in the coastwise trade on both coasts, as well as on our lakes and rivers. The evil is prevalent, recognized, and complained of. The proper function of a railroad corporation is to operate trains on its tracks, not to occupy the waters with ships in mock competition with itself, which in reality operate to the extinction of all genuine competition. In answering demands for the exclusion of railroad-owned ships from the canal, which in this bill or any other would simply amount to an amendment of the act to regulate commerce, the committee thinks it wise, just, and opportune to broaden the amendment so as to serve the higher, wider, more pressing, and more necessary purpose of excluding the railroads from operating vessels in competition with their tracks anywhere in the coastwise trade generally or in the lakes and rivers. This section also provides for the connection of railroads in through routes and joint rates with water carriers in all domestic traffic in accordance with their practices in connection with vessels engaged in the foreign trade. By that means the benefits of the canal can be distributed through the interior and enable the entire country to enjoy some good therefrom. Instead of competing with themselves by running vessels through the canal the railroads can perform the more noble and valuable service of connecting on either coast with coastwise vessels passing through the canal, and by joint rates and through routes afford convenient schedules and fair rates and conditions of commerce to the people living many hundreds of miles inland from both coasts.

Section 12: This section makes adequate provision for extradition of criminals and fugitives from justice.

Section 13: This section provides for the transfer of authority and jurisdiction over the Panama Canal with all its adjuncts, appendants, and appurtenances to Army officers to be designated by the President upon the approach of war, and during the war, or when war is imminent the canal shall be operated and all affairs administered according to the order of such Army officer.

Section 14: This section denominates this act as the Panama Canal act.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has labored unremittingly for a long time to work out the problems involved, and to present legislation adequate to meet the requirements of all conditions, existing or anticipated in connection with the maintenance, sanitation, and operation of the canal and the incidental civil administration. The important question of protection belongs to the jurisdiction of another committee. We have visited the Isthmus several times at the various stages of progress in constructing the canal. We have provided and reported necessary legislation at different times during the period of its construction. At various times we have had hearings concerning different phases of the subject. During the past three months we have heard expert witnesses in every line of life, and in every learned profession, and in every line of business, commerce, and navigation who in any wise could be interested in the construction and operation of the canal or were able by their information to throw light upon the questions involved. As a result we have acquired for the use of Congress and the public through those hearings several volumes of valuable if not exhaustive information covering the canal subject in all its phases, origin, stages, progress, and future. We trust that the results of our labors now laid before the Congress may prove of some value in assisting Congress to enact adequate legislation for the successful operation of this great and glorious enterprise and the satisfactory government and administration of all its adjuncts and appurtenances.

Respectfully submitted, by order of the committee.

COTTON.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to address the House at length. I only desire to make a statement, correcting a false and scandalous report recently made, emanating from the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, founded on a so-called investigation of one of its agents, a report not justified by facts as they exist, which reflects injuriously upon the management of cotton mills located in the immediate section in which I live and which does great injustice to those who earn their daily bread by work in those mills. It has been my wish for some days to call attention to this report. I have not done so hitherto, because of the great pressure of public and important business demanding the attention of this House. But I can not allow this libel to longer go unchallenged. The conclusions in the report to which I allude have as their basis a so-called investigation of the condition of 21 families of cotton-mill workers in the South. Ten of these families live in or near Atlanta, Ga., six just outside of Greensboro, N. C., my home, and five near Burlington, N. C., a town in my district, only a few miles from Greensboro. In this report, amongst other statements, will be found the following, which, by permission, will be printed with my remarks:

The opportunities offered the people to improve their condition are limited. They rarely have a choice as to the kind of house they must live in. Overcrowding is as likely, or even more likely, to occur in a family with a large income than with one with a small income, for a large income usually means a large family, always a large number of workers. Certain other factors, less tangible, perhaps, have a bearing upon the prevailing standard of living. These may be referred to as limitation of ideals. Often where the income is large the home is most unattractive, with bare floors and a few necessary articles of furniture. Nothing appears comfortable, nothing beautiful. The casual observer would say that the family was living in poverty, yet they might have plenty of good food, plenty of fire, and the children might be well dressed. The explanation for this state of affairs is simple. It is not that these mill girls and boys are vain, extravagant creatures, thinking only of personal adornment. Most of them have never seen a well-furnished house. Their friends live as they do. There is no shame in inviting them to a house that is bare. They see, however, in the shop windows and on the people they pass in the street a display of clothing that sets for them a higher standard as regards clothing than they have in other respects. One other important feature enters into the lives of most of these people. Relatively few of them live in large cities. In a city there are a great many things that enrich the poor man's life that he does not have to pay for directly out of his income. There are parks and playgrounds, baths, libraries, art galleries, public lectures, etc. But the cotton-mill family has none of these.

Falsehood travels fast and its journeys are long. Yesterday I received a newspaper containing a marked copy of this libel. I have also received recently a paper in which is published a letter from three worthy young women who for five years have worked in the weaving room of the Proximity Manufacturing Co., representing one of the four mills near Greensboro, N. C. The letter reads as follows, and by permission will also be printed with my remarks:

We have read the article which was published in the papers a few days ago on Southern cotton-mill life and hereby denounce the statements as false and wish to state them as they really are.

We 3 have worked in the cotton mills for 8 or 10 years and have worked for the Proximity Manufacturing Co. for about 5 years in the weaving room.

We have nice, kind overseers and make good wages, averaging from $1.32 to $2.64 per day. We work only 10 hours each day up to Saturday, when we quit work at 11.40 o'clock. We are never made to work when we are unable. After our expenses we are able to save from $15 to $20 per month.

Mr. Cone, the owner of the Proximity mill, has provided for us two nice churches, a good school, and a hall, in which our fraternal orders may meet; also an assembly hall, in which we may give receptions or entertainments. He has employed for us teachers of sewing and cooking, so that the ladies of the village may become acquainted with the art of domestic science. We also have a nice library at the school, where we can get books to read through the summer. He has provided for us a large picnic ground, where the inhabitants of the three villages—Proximity, Revolution, and White Oak—assemble on the Fourth of July to celebrate and have a good time generally. Refreshments and good things to eat are served throughout that day, while the textile band furnishes enlivening music. Mr. Cone bears all these expenses, and we feel that he gives this to show his love for his employees.

In the spring he furnishes every home with flower and grass seeds, and then on the Fourth of July he awards prizes for the most beautiful yards and neatly kept premises. And then on Christmas he presents each family with a nice fat turkey. What more could anyone want?

The article which was published in the paper on Southern cotton-mill life stated that our daily fare consisted of corn bread and sirup and that the mothers wear the discarded dresses of their daughters. We say this is absolutely false. There are, perhaps, some very few who live very poorly, but the majority are in very good circumstances. They have plenty to eat and nice clothes to wear.

And we wish to say in the end that we are improving every day. Electric lights are now being placed in the homes and on the streets. This is an example of a Southern cotton mill. We hope none of them are as bad as they are reported by some people.

What matters; on that great day to come we will not be judged by what we eat and wear, but we will all be judged alike, rich or poor. We hope this will show the author of the article concerning Southern cotton mills of his mistake.

Anyone wanting proof of these statements which we have made can get our names at the office of the Daily News, and we will stand good for any of them.

THREE PROXIMITY MILL GIRLS.

It is a complete and truthful statement of the general conditions existing amongst the families who work in three of the four mills near Greensboro controlled by Mr. Cæsar Cone, who is the gentleman alluded to in the letter just read. I have a personal knowledge of many of the methods and means adopted by Mr. Cone to enhance the happiness and prosperity of those who labor in the mills of which he is the master spirit. It is my good fortune to know him intimately. I do not think I have ever met any man whose heart is more imbued with the spirit of humanity. Wherever there is distress, and the knowledge comes to him, he is ever ready to render assistance to all who deserve it. In very many instances his help has been given to persons entirely unknown by him. A man of the highest order of business ability with a heart so kind would never allow the conditions to exist as represented in the report to which I have alluded. Neither squalid poverty nor vice with its hideous mien finds a resting place amongst families working for him. I know that he regards himself not only as their employer but as the trustee for their prosperity and advancement in life. I am not personally cognizant of the condition existing in the fourth mill located near Greensboro, N. C., but I know well those who control it. They are kind, humane, and honorable men, who would never tolerate such a state of affairs as set out in the report heretofore alluded to. I can say the same as to conditions in the mills near Burlington, N. C. I believe that I know their true status, not of my own personal knowledge but from information derived from those with whom I have been acquainted for many years and whose words are entitled to full and absolute credit.

I know nothing whatever of my own personal knowledge of the conditions existing in the mill settlement near Atlanta, Ga.; but taking the false statements made as to conditions near Greensboro, N. C., and Burlington, N. C., as a guide, I assume, and think I have a right to do so, that the statements in the report as to conditions near Atlanta are also false. In truth and in fact, I am morally certain that no such conditions exist in any mill settlement anywhere in the South as are described in this report. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman can, with equal assurance, make the same statement with reference to the mills not only in Atlanta, but in the State of Georgia also, because, if the gentleman will permit me, this very report in its details shows that these mill operatives, by the menu that they publish for each meal, fare better in many instances and in most instances than do people at the boarding houses in the city of Washington.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. STEDMAN. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have the honor to represent a district that produces a great deal of cotton, and manufactures more than it produces, and while I have not read the report carefully to find what slander, if any, is leveled against the people of that particular district, I want to say that every factory village in the district that I represent is a model community. The people who work in the factories have good houses, good churches, good schools, all necessary opportunities and facilities for entertainment and recreation; every form of vice is debarred; the people live well and receive good wages. The best Fourth of July barbecues, some of the best home dinners I have ever enjoyed I partook of with these good mill people. I want to say, as my friend the gentleman from Georgia, Judge BARTLETT, has just said, that I had rather risk getting a good wholesome meal with any of these people than I would in Washington at the ordinary boarding house or American-plan hotel.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. STEDMAN. If the gentleman will excuse me, I have but a few minutes remaining.

The agent who is responsible for this report, for it must have had as a basis his so-called investigation, is unfortunate in one of the reasons he gives for the conditions described, when he attributes the dreary hours passed by these employees and their lack of opportunity for enjoyment and pleasure to the fact that few of them live in large cities. He, perhaps, has learned something if he attended the hearings recently had before the Committee on Rules of this House with reference to conditions existing amongst mill operatives who work in cities far from the southern section of this great country.

When this agent is better informed he will know that whilst the life near great cities has some advantages, at the same time it has also disadvantages. Many of the anxieties and vices incident to city life are unknown to the happy and contented people who dwell in agricultural districts.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in describing the forlorn condition of one of the families working in a mill near Greensboro, N. C., this wonderful investigating agent says: "Their chief diversion is going to preaching and Sunday school." This habit of "going to preaching and Sunday school" belongs not to this family alone but from time immemorial to all who have dwelt in North Carolina. It has formed the basis of the character of the great people amongst whom I live and whom I have the honor in part to represent. It has impressed them with a supreme sense of duty. It has made the men of North Carolina renowned in war as well as illustrious in the brighter and happier days of peace. [Applause.]

I urge the agent of the Bureau of Commerce and Labor to cultivate this habit of the family near Greensboro, to whom he has given so much publicity. If for "diversion" any time he should happen to be present at "preaching" or "Sunday school," I trust it may so happen that his especial attention may be directed to the divine command which he will find in the twentieth chapter of Exodus—"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." [Applause.]

PLACING NAMES OF MANUFACTURERS ON MANUFACTURED ARTICLES.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 16844) requiring manufacturers to place their names on articles they manufacture. The print of the bill has been exhausted, and there are many demands for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 16844. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GOOD-ROADS CONVENTION.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a short article which pertains to the good-roads convention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a short article respecting the good-roads convention. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

OFFICIAL CALL FOR A WOMEN'S STATE GOOD-ROADS CONVENTION AT THE AUDITORIUM HOTEL APRIL 3 AND 4, 1912.

At the recent Illinois State good-roads convention, on Lincoln's birthday, it was unanimously resolved to seek the aid of the women of Illinois for the great movement for good roads and streets.

An Illinois woman's good roads convention is hereby called to meet at the Auditorium Hotel on April 3 and 4 for the promotion of a more general interest among women in the good-roads movement.

The importance of this movement for good roads is being recognized as never before, and it is felt that when the women of the State add their influence to that of the press and clergy a victory will have been won, greater and more far-reaching in effect than any other within a generation. For it is a matter of tremendous import that in the United States bad roads are directly responsible for the loss of a billion dollars a year, and the saving of this stupendous sum surely constitutes an economic question of vast importance.

When the agricultural production alone of the United States for the past 11 years totals more than $70,000,000,000, a sum to stagger the imagination, and it cost more to take this product from the farm to the railway station than from such station to the American and European markets, and when the saving in cost of moving this product of agriculture over good roads instead of bad would have built a million miles of good roads, the incalculable waste of bad roads in this country is shown to be of such enormous proportions as to demand immediate reformation and the wisest and best statesmanship.

Great as is the loss to transportation, mercantile, industrial, and farming interests incomparably greater is the loss to women and children and social life, a matter as important as civilization itself, and the truth of the declaration of Charles Sumner 50 years ago, that "The two greatest forces for the advancement of civilization are the schoolmaster and good roads," is emphasized by the experience of the intervening years and points to the wisdom of a union of educational forces for aggressive action for permanent roads and streets.

Women who are interested are urged to be present from every town and county in the State.

THE ILLINOIS STATE GOOD ROADS ASSOCIATION.

CHICAGO, ILL., March 14, 1912.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Please personally urge upon Speaker CLARK the importance of his addressing women's good roads' convention April 3 or 4.

ADELA PARKER KENDALL,
Chairman Program Committee.

THE EXCISE-TAX BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships. Pending that motion, I desire to ascertain if I can reach some agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] with reference to the time to be allowed for general debate and the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that, so far as I know, gentlemen upon this side desire between five and six hours of general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Would the gentleman be willing to debate the bill to-day, and if we can get an agreement to transfer the business in order on Monday to Thursday to continue general debate on Monday, and at 4 o'clock Monday to take up the bill for consideration under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MANN. I suggest that we take it up on Tuesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The reason I ask is that there are a number of gentlemen who desire to leave the city on Tuesday, and I would like to accommodate them if I can.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that Monday will probably be celebrated quite extensively as St. Patrick's day, and a good many Members will be away on that day on that account.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To-morrow, Sunday, is St. Patrick's day, but I suppose it will be celebrated on Monday.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and I think a number of gentlemen from both sides of the House will be away on account of that celebration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the gentleman is not willing to take it up for consideration under the five-minute rule at 4 o'clock on Monday?

Mr. MANN. As a matter of convenience to Members I do not think it would be well to do that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My request is that we close general debate on Monday at 4 o'clock and then take it up for consideration under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if in the meantime we can get in 10 hours of general debate, by meeting, say, at 11 o'clock on Monday, if the gentleman is in a hurry to get a vote, perhaps that would be satisfactory. Let us say that we take five hours and a half to-day, up until 6 o'clock, and then take up the bill at 11 o'clock on Monday, if he desires to close general debate on Monday.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are a good many gentlemen going away on account of the celebration of St. Patrick's day on Monday. They have made engagements to speak.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would ask gentlemen on the other side whether they desire to consider the bill under the five-minute rule or will they be willing to offer a substitute for the bill?

Mr. MANN. I think gentlemen would wish to consider it under the five-minute rule for a short time, probably.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I am not anxious to consider the bill under the five-minute rule, because it is simply a perfunctory matter of offering amendments. Still, there may be some gentlemen who are unable to speak in the time allotted for general debate who would like to get in for a while under the five-minute rule. I think some little time might be spent in that way in debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will make this proposition to gentlemen: That business which is in order on Monday be transferred to Thursday; that this bill shall be debated under general debate to-day and on Monday; and that on Tuesday morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, it shall be taken up under the five-minute rule for amendments and be debated for two hours, at the end of which time the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, if any, and that the previous question shall then be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. PAYNE. That is, after two hours of debate under the five-minute rule on Tuesday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I see no objection to that, with the understanding that the time is to be used on this bill to-day and on Monday in general debate, and that we are not to have something else intervening to take the place of it.

Mr. JAMES. That is the proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, that is the understanding, and that the time shall be equally divided between the gentleman from New York and myself.

Mr. PAYNE. I am content with that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make this request: That business which is in order on Monday next shall be transferred to Thursday; that this bill—H. R. 21214—shall be taken up when we go into the committee for general debate to-day and on Monday; that the general debate shall close when the House adjourns on Monday, and that the bill shall be considered for two hours under the five-minute rule on Tuesday; that at the expiration of those two hours the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with any pending amendments that are adopted; and that the previous question shall then be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday next be transferred to Thursday; that when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 21214, general debate shall run to-day and on Monday; that general debate shall close Monday evening, the time to be controlled on one side by himself and upon the other by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]; that on Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal, debate upon the bill under the five-minute rule shall continue for two hours, at the end of which time the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, if any, with the further agreement that the previous question shall then be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21214.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21214, the excise tax bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] will take the chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee assumed the chair amidst general applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations, to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person, firm, or copartnership residing in the United States, any Territory thereof, or in Alaska or the District of Columbia, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such person equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by such person from all sources during each year; or, if a nonresident, such nonresident person shall likewise be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such person equivalent to 1 per cent upon the amount of net income over and above $5,000 received by such person from business transacted and capital invested within the United States and its Territories, etc.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, a number of months ago the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] introduced the first draft of this bill and is entitled to much and most of the credit for its authorship. The present bill does not conform entirely to the lines introduced by the gentleman, but in the main it does.

I therefore yield one hour to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] to present the bill to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, whenever it is proposed to modify our existing system of class taxation and to add or substitute in part an honest and wholesome method, we are always met with that old cry of privilege, that the method proposed is unconstitutional or inoperative or unproductive. I desire to discuss this bill and these stock objections that have been urged against it.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to revenue the prime purpose of the pending measure is to secure justice in taxation. I therefore favor the excise tax proposed as a bona fide means of raising adequate revenue and equalizing existing tax burdens. There is no sounder rule than to require the citizen annually to pay a tax, measured by a fair and just proportion of his net gains. This golden rule of taxation has been written as nearly as possible in the measure now under consideration. This bill assumes that every American citizen is honest enough and patriotic enough to willingly bear his fair share of the tax burdens. It is expected, therefore, that this measure will encounter the opposition of those who, claiming and enjoying all the benefits of government, would shirk its burdens. The blessings and the burdens of government go hand in hand. No good citizen will invoke the one and evade the other.

Mr. Chairman, the gross inequality of our present system of taxation constitutes a severe reflection on the intelligence and the fairness of the American people. That system, unequal as it is indefensible, is the mightiest engine of oppression imposed upon an honest yeomanry since the feudal ages. The chief burden of all tariff and local taxes now falls upon the middle and poorer classes. Only those more able to pay escape it. The people of small annual earnings, not exceeding $1,500 to $2,000, including the small landowner, pay the great bulk of our local and customhouse taxation. The manner in which those of large means escape even local tax burdens is well shown in the report of the special tax commission of New York in 1907, headed by ex-Senator Warner Miller, in part as follows:

First. That the assessed value of all personal property is (in New York State) approximately $800,000,000.

Second. That the value of all personal property owned by citizens of this State is not less than $25,000,000,000.

Third. That the richer a person grows the less he pays in relation to his property or income.

Fourth. Experience has shown that under the present system personal property practically escapes taxation for either local or State purposes.

Mr. Chairman, it may be safely said that this condition exists in the State and local tax systems, in relative proportion, throughout the Union. Most large owners of real estate and concealed personalty pay nominal taxes in proportion to their ability.

Turning again to our Federal taxes, it may be said that while our internal-revenue taxes are not subject to criticism, our system of high protective-tariff taxation is an outrage in its operation and effects. It is conceived upon the idea that the people should be taxed according to their needs and practically according to their poverty. [Applause.] It is the personification of avarice and selfishness. Under it the manufacturer "taxes the masses to the limit of his ability to extort or of their ability to pay." No civilized or humane people can longer tolerate this system of diabolical extortion. In contributing $314,000,000 to the Federal Treasury, the American consumer is compelled at the same time to hand over at least $1,500,000,000 to those individuals given special favors by the high protective tariff tax. The excise tax proposes to displace customhouse revenues to the extent of at least $60,000,000, shift the burden to those having annual net profits exceeding $5,000, and, at the same time, save to the people the relative sum of $300,000,000 now collected as toll by the manufacturer for the privilege of payment by the people of high protective tariff taxes.

Edmund Burke said:

You can tax the shirt off a man's back by indirect tariff taxation without serious complaint on his part.

[Applause.]

This system has yielded fortunes to the few, but it has imposed great hardships and privations upon the many. Whichever way the middle and the poorer classes turn they are confronted with the unjust distribution of wealth and tax burdens. This system places a high premium on wealth and a severe penalty on poverty. Everywhere the complaint goes up that the masses are burdened with Federal, State, county, and municipal taxation far beyond their just proportion and their ability to pay, while those of larger means continue to augment them with little or no disturbance from the tax gatherer. We thus have presented not alone a question of popular unrest and discontent, but of rankest injustice.

Mr. Chairman, what is the remedy? Congress should lop off all the inequalities and injustices in the present system of high-protective tariff taxation, placing it on a sound revenue basis, imposing maximum rates on luxuries and minimum rates, or none at all, on necessities, and in the absence of power to lay a comprehensive income tax impose a general excise tax on the doing of business, measured by annual net income. [Applause.] This latter method will take care of the revenue and, more nearly than any other available remedy, will equalize tax burdens.

In 1909, when the Payne bill was drafted, revenue necessities moved the Republicans to add a tax on tea, coffee, and inheritances. The tax on inheritances reached the Senate. While the Payne bill was pending there it was discovered that the adoption of a general income-tax amendment was imminent. Thereupon, in some haste, the corporation-tax amendment was brought in and adopted in lieu of the proposed tax on inheritances and incomes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman will allow me to proceed a little further first.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Just on that question to which the gentleman is referring.

Mr. HULL. I am familiar with the statement that the gentleman made as to this in his speech two years ago.

The pending bill merely extends and makes more complete and equitable the corporation-tax law. It may be here remarked that in 1911 customs revenues fell off $19,000,000 from those of the previous year, and thus far in the fiscal year 1912 they show a still further decline of nearly $9,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the proposed excise tax, not as a tax by itself, but as a permanent part of our whole revenue system. No one method of taxation should be considered singly, but as a part of a complete system which all taxes combine to form. For the purposes I have stated, this, or a similar method of taxation, has been adopted and made a permanent part of the fiscal system in almost every other civilized government of the world. The tax which this bill proposes contains no doctrine nor method new to this country. It contains the principle and really the method embraced in the present corporation-tax act and section 27 of the excise-tax act of 1898. Each essential feature of this bill is taken almost bodily, either from the excise act of 1898 or from the present corporation-tax law, or both. The Supreme Court has, in all respects, upheld the doctrine of both acts, as well as the validity of their administrative features, in the cases of Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. against McClain (192 U. S.) and Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S.). No one can successfully attack the validity of the proposed tax without first having secured a reversal of the two decisions I have named. Congress has no right to assume or fear that the Supreme Court would reverse or even modify either of these decisions as they affect the proposed tax. For, in the language of Mr. Justice Brown in the income-tax cases—

> Congress ought never to legislate in raising the revenues of the Government in fear that important laws like this shall encounter the veto of this court through a change in its opinion or be crippled in great political crises by its inability to raise a revenue for immediate use.

The question, and the only question, that might be raised against the validity of this tax is of easy determination in the light of recent Supreme Court decisions. Those who seek the defeat of indirect-tax measures usually offer the stereotyped objection that the tax proposed is a direct tax and therefore comes within the rule of apportionment, under the decision in the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 and 158 U. S.). But the court, in the Spreckels and the Flint cases, clearly differentiated and distinguished between this excise tax and the taxes held invalid without apportionment in the Pollock case. The Spreckels case clearly established the principle that a tax such as this bill proposes is an excise tax upon the doing of business and not a direct tax on property or its income, and therefore within the power of Congress to impose without apportionment according to population. In this decision the Supreme Court, after citing a number of cases in point, said:

> In view of these and other decided cases we can not hold that the tax imposed on the plaintiff expressly with reference to its "carrying on or doing the business of refining sugar," and which was to be measured by its gross annual receipts in excess of a named sum, is other than is described in the act of Congress, a special excise tax and not a direct one to be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers. This conclusion is inevitable from the judgments in prior cases, etc.

Mr. Chairman, this excise tax avoids the Pollock decision and in its effects, closely approximates a general income tax. The applicable provisions of the Constitution of the United States in this connection are found in Article I, section 8, clause 1, and in Article I, section 2, clause 3, and Article I, section 9, clause 4. They are, respectively:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.
> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers.
> No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

From the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Hylton v. United States (3 Dall), in 1796, down to the decision in the Pollock case in 1894, it had been uniformly held that under the Constitution there were only two kinds of direct taxes, namely, a capitation or poll tax and a tax on land. In 1894 Congress enacted a law imposing a tax on the net annual income of all persons and corporations. The validity of this act was involved in the Pollock case. The Supreme Court held certain provisions of the act invalid and disposed of the remaining provisions in the following language:

> We have considered the act only in respect of the tax on income derived from real estate and from invested personal property, and have not commented on so much of it as bears on gains or profits from business, privileges, or employments, in view of the instances in which taxation on business, privileges, or employments has assumed the guise of an excise tax and been sustained as such. (158 U. S., 635.)

And as to the excise taxes, the Chief Justice said:

> We do not mean to say that an act laying by apportionment a direct tax on all real estate or personal property, or the income thereof, might not also lay excise taxes on business, privileges, employments, and vocations. (P. 637.)

I may say here that I do not consider the decision in the Pollock case sound. I believe the weight of reasoning is in the dissenting opinions. But the proposed tax in nowise conflicts with the Pollock decision in the light of subsequent holdings of the court. In this decision the court merely held for the first time that, in addition to the two kinds of direct taxes I have named, there are two other kinds, viz, a tax on incomes derived from real estate and a tax on incomes derived from invested personalty. Furthermore, the language I have just read clearly conveys the understanding that those provisions of the Wilson law which levied a tax on incomes derived from businesses, trades, professions, employments, privileges, and vocations were considered free from constitutional objection. In harmony with this view the court has also held that a tax on the income of business—which is property in a sense—was an excise and not a direct tax, in the following cases:

> Pacific Insurance Company v. Soule (7 Wall., 433).
> Railroad Company v. Collector (100 U. S., 595).
> United States v. Erie Railroad Co. (106 U. S., 327).
> Springer v. United States (102 U. S., 586).

It must be conceded that, since a tax on the income of business, as above held, is not a direct tax, a tax on business itself is still further removed from the field of direct taxation.

In the license-tax cases (5 Wall.) and in the Flint case the Supreme Court thus defines the taxing power of Congress:

> Congress can not tax exports, and it must impose direct taxes by the rule of apportionment and indirect taxes by the rule of uniformity. Thus limited, and thus only, it reaches every subject and may be exercised at discretion.

In the case of Knowlton v. Moore (178 U. S.) the court referred to the Pollock decision, holding a tax on incomes derived from real estate or invested personalty to be direct, and then proceeded to draw a clear line between the field of direct and indirect taxation as the latter relates to this bill in the following language:

> These conclusions, however, lend no support to the contention that it was decided that duties, imposts, and excises, which are not the essential equivalents of a tax on property generally, real or personal, solely because of its ownership, must be converted into direct taxes, because it is conceived that it would be demonstrated by a close analysis that they could not be shifted from the person upon whom they first fall.

Under its excise power, as more definitely defined in the Pollock case, Congress in 1898 imposed an excise tax upon the doing of either of three designated businesses by persons, firms, or corporations, the tax to be measured by a percentage of the earnings derived from the business carried on. Construing this act in the Spreckels case the Supreme Court not only said this was a tax on "the doing or carrying on of business," and not a tax on the income derived therefrom, but that the tax was not payable unless there was a carrying on of business as designated. It is important also to note the holding of the court in this case that the measure of such tax may be the income from the business, although a part of the income is derived from real estate, which is nontaxable without apportionment, either in itself or as to its income.

It will be seen, also, that this excise act of 1898 laid an excise tax simply on "the doing or carrying on of business," without regard to the capacity in which it might be carried on, alike on all persons, companies, and corporations. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill contains the identical language of section 27 of the act cited as to the subject of the tax, viz, "The doing or carrying on of business." In the act of 1898 Congress desired to limit the subject of the tax, with the result that it provided a basis of classification by designating the doing of three kinds of business on which the tax should fall. Since this tax applied to "every person, firm, or corporation," without exemption of either, no basis of classification as to the persons taxed was necessary, and the addition of the words "doing business in a corporate capacity" after the word "corporations" would have been surplusage. This ferm was properly used in the corporation-tax act, however, as a basis for classifying corporations for taxation and thereby exempting individuals and firms.

Mr. Chairman, Congress may lay an excise tax on business by almost innumerable methods both as to the subject of the tax and the person taxed. This tax might be applied to one designated business, or to a limited number of designated businesses, or to all kinds of business without special designation of either. The tax might likewise be applied to all persons, firms, and corporations, or to either, or to certain classes of either.

In the Flint case the Supreme Court said:

> In levying excise taxes the most ample authority has been recognized from the beginning to select some and omit other possible subjects of taxation, to select one calling and omit another, to tax one class of property and to forbear to tax another.

The court went on to cite 14 decisions upholding as many different excise-tax levies by Congress. In the Pollock case it was agreed by both counsel and the court that Congress had the unquestioned power to tax corporations and individuals in the same manner and at the same rate. Nothing to the contrary was even intimated by either the court or counsel in the Spreckels and Flint cases; in fact, it was assumed.

In the Flint case the court held that this tax could be measured not alone by the net income derived from a particular business source but from all sources, including net income from real estate or State and municipal bonds. Yet, I repeat, Congress has no power to levy a tax on either real estate or the net income therefrom without apportionment; and it has no power to levy a tax at all directly or indirectly on State or municipal bonds nor the income therefrom.

Mr. Chairman, to further discuss the validity of the proposed bill largely involves a repetition of the legal controversies, now settled, which were had with respect to the validity of the excise acts of 1898 and 1909, and I shall therefore proceed to discuss other phases of the bill. The controlling purpose of many countries in adopting this or a similar tax has been to equalize the tax burdens by reaching those paying the least taxes but most able to pay. In no other way has it been found possible to keep down the rising tide of popular discontent, unrest, and criticism due to tax systems which, like ours, imposed grossly disproportionate burdens upon the people. I insist that this or an income tax is the only efficient method of equalizing taxation in this country. Republicans in the main, obeying the behest of the protected and other special interests, have long looked with disfavor upon such a tax. They now do. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They support a measure tending in this direction only when writhing under the lash of public sentiment or as a means of defeating a like measure more comprehensive. In their zeal to perpetuate their system of high protective tariff taxation and the trusts, most Republicans contend that a general excise or income tax ought not to be levied save in times of great emergency and that it should be only a temporary tax. President Taft in various utterances has indicated this view. In other words, the Republican doctrine is that our present high taxes on food, clothing, shelter—on all the prime necessaries of life—should be made permanent, but that all taxes measured by the great incomes derived from colossal wealth should be very temporary. [Applause.] The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] stated the stock argument of privilege always made against this kind of indirect taxation when he wrote in his minority report on the sugar bill that this proposed tax was "a direct tax and probably unconstitutional." But since this view has proven so untenable, the opposition falls back upon the plan of attempting to discredit this bill by the plea that its scope is not broad enough to apply to that class of persons possessing large wealth and income. This objection is not based upon a desire to see this tax reach the few persons to whom this bill will not apply, but it springs from an overweening desire to discredit this entire method of taxation. Every device that privilege could conjure up has always been thrown in the way of this and income taxation. Many opponents of this and the income method of taxation now urge against this measure the sinister plea that it is invalid and inoperative and that it is necessary indefinitely to delay this wholesome legislation until the ratification of the pending income-tax amendment. At the same time others most active in their opposition to the income-tax amendment say that Congress already has practically the same power and facility of taxation, viz, the excise tax. On page 26 of the memorial presented to the New York Legislature in 1910 by Joseph H. Choate, John G. Milburn, William D. Guthrie, Francis L. Stetson, and others, protesting against the ratification of the income-tax amendment, I find this language:

> The corporation tax law of 1909 is an income tax on the business of corporations and is not apportioned, because an excise, and it will ultimately produce a very large revenue. Every business, every source of production can be similarly reached. A competent commission, such as would be appointed in England, would in a few months devise a complete and equitable system of excise taxation, provided, of course, political considerations did not paralyze them.

We see that when one of these kindred methods of taxation is proposed the opponents of both methods play the other against it as the best available means of defeating both. I say the proposed legislation will hasten the ratification of the income-tax amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the scope of the application of the proposed tax must necessarily be determined by the comprehensiveness of the term "business" as defined in the act. The Supreme Court has laid down its tax-meaning definition as follows:

> Everything about which a person can be employed; all activities which occupy the time, attention, and labor of persons for the purpose of a livelihood or profit.

How could this definition be more comprehensive? The Supreme Court thus wrote into the Flint decision the broadest meaning of the term "business" for the purpose of making it the subject of an excise tax. No definition of business given in any other sense is so wide in its scope. First, it embraces "everything about which a person can be employed"; second, it embraces all activities engaged in by a person "for the purpose of a livelihood or profit." All the court decisions and textbook writers say that the term "business," as correctly defined in this bill "in its broadest sense includes nearly all the affairs in which either an individual or a corporation can be actors." (Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure and citations therein, vol. 6, p. 260.)

In ascertaining whether the proposed tax applies to a person the only inquiry is whether that person is engaged in such activities as come within the phrase "carrying on or doing business." If so, he is liable for the tax whether such activities are few or many, frequent or infrequent, narrow or broad, or relate to real estate or invested personalty which can not be taxed in itself or as to its income. Whether a person is "doing business" must depend on the special facts of each case. I agree that the mere ownership of property unaccompanied by any activities in the sense above defined would not bring such owner within the application of the proposed law. However, the most casual reflection must convince one that the number or class of persons who would thus escape taxation would be remote.

The opposition to this bill—deliberately disregarding the plain holding of both the Spreckels and the Flint cases—seem to contend that this tax is in legal effect an income tax and can not therefore be measured by incomes derived from real estate and invested personalty, because the Pollock decision held that a tax could not be laid directly upon such incomes, and because the court held, in the case of Zonne v. Minneapolis Syndicate (220 U. S.), that under the particular facts of that case a realty corporation was not liable for an excise business tax. This view entirely overlooks the fact that in the Minnesota case the court merely held that since the corporation was not performing a single activity in respect to the real estate to which it merely held title, nor a single business activity in any other respect, the company, therefore, was not "doing business" and so not subject to any tax. If, entirely apart from its ownership of this real estate, this corporation had been engaged in any other kind of business activities within the meaning of the term "business," the tax would have applied and been measured by the income from all sources, including the real estate in question. This latter rule would apply to all persons merely owning real estate or invested personalty and performing no activity in respect thereto, but at the same time performing business activities entirely disconnected therefrom. This Minnesota case does not embrace those large holders of real estate, mortgages on realty and personalty, bonds, and other securities who devote their activities in person or through numerous agents and employees, or both, to the work of looking after and managing their property and guarding their mortgage and other rights and collecting interest or other compensation with respect thereto.

It can not be conceived that when the Supreme Court in the Pollock case removed from the field of income taxation, except by the utterly impractical method of apportionment, that great class of wealth embraced in the terms "real estate and invested personalty," the court intended thereby to place the bulk of the country's wealth beyond the efficient taxing power of Congress. That decision, in the light of the Spreckels and Flint decisions, necessarily contemplated that there still rests in Congress the undoubted power to accomplish practically the same revenue purposes by other feasible methods of taxation and which is now well established, including an excise tax on business. In applying this tax we must also keep in mind the fact that under our modern industrial, financial, and commercial conditions an individual may limit his personal business activities to a very narrow scope, employing only at occasional intervals but little of his time, attention, or labor, and yet that person may, by means of his wealth, by general direction or supervision, be a tremendous factor or agency in placing or keeping in operation immense business activities.

To be engaged in business under this bill it is not necessary that one should in his physical person, or in a strictly official capacity, be immediately and proximately connected with the business carried on. To better illustrate: The bondholders of corporations are not subject to the corporation tax. The bonded debt of a corporation is a part of its capital, even more so than the stock at times, because the latter is often watered. Interest on such bonds is usually preferred in payment to the dividends to stockholders. The bondholder is interested in keeping his bonds at a fair market value and in the certain payment of proper interest thereon. The result is that they are usually given, or at least they exercise, authority to maintain, in an organized or other capacity, a general supervision over the conduct and management of the corporate business, although they are neither officers nor stockholders therein. The time, attention, and labor thus bestowed would clearly subject such bondholders to this tax. This business fact should also be applied to the holders of mortgages on realty and personalty and considered in connection with their other activities, including those of loooking after and protecting their property and collecting interest thereon. Furthermore, when we consider the ramifications and complexities of modern business, the innumerable forms of wealth and its countless uses, the close business relationship and connection existing between the large holders of mortgages, bonds, and other securities and those actively conducting great business enterprises, their interdependency of interests, and their frequent and continuing business cooperation, and so forth, it would, in my judgment, be difficult to find but a limited number of the former to whom this tax would not apply.

Mr. Chairman, it is admitted that in a case where an owner of real estate, for a fixed rental, leases the same for a long term of years, and thereby parting with the entire control, care, and management of the same, and ceasing to perform any activity in respect thereto, merely receiving the rentals, this tax, in the absence of other business activities, would not apply. However, these exceptions would not embrace that large field of activities consisting of short-term leases of realty under such terms or conditions as that the owner continues a factor, directly or indirectly, or in a general way, either in furnishing supplies, equipments, or repairs during or at the beginning of each rental period, or in the care, management, or general supervision or control of the same.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me right there to ask him a question? I am following him with much interest.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. If a man has an income on a lease of one year or five years or any number of years of $5,000, that would not come, according to the gentleman's contention, within the provisions of the act and be liable to a tax, provided he was doing nothing else? Is that the gentleman's statement?

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am undertaking to set out what I consider the general rules applicable to the different phases of the operation of this bill. There are 10,000 business conditions existing in this country. I am undertaking to use here terms that are well settled both in the court decisions and in the law books. As to the application of the rules which this proposed legislation embodies, that is a matter that would naturally be left to the administrative officials. I am about to make a further statement in connection with the inquiry of the gentleman which will shed some more light.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me just there, I am not controverting his conclusions, but I wanted to see what they were. I would be glad to know if a man has $6,000 worth of income on a lease, running for a number of years, and is doing nothing else in the world, if the gentleman is inclined to the opinion that that would not be subject to taxation under the proposed law, but if he was making a hundred dollars keeping a candy shop or doing anything else that would bring him within the law and make the $6,000 of rent taxable? In making up the statement is the $100 or the $1,000 he might have from an activity wholly dissociated from the income from the leasehold?

Mr. HULL. That statement that when the tax once lodges on any business it is measured by the income from all sources is correct, and it would be true in nine-tenths of the cases, in my judgment, that income from a lease, as the gentleman suggests, would be embraced in measuring the tax, even though it should be true in some instances that no business activities were engaged in with respect to the use of such property, but in other respects.

Passing to another phase, Mr. Chairman, this bill would reach all the individual bondholders and practically all the individual stockholders of holding corporations in this country. The corporation-tax law exempts from its provisions all "amounts received by a corporation as dividends upon stock of other corporations subject to the tax." This practically exempts all holding companies from the corporation tax, for the reason that virtually all their stock is invested in their subsidiary companies. Many States prohibit the organization of these holding companies on grounds of public policy. In the Northern Securities case the Supreme Court held one great holding corporation illegal. The purpose of many large holding companies is to control and monopolize production in different lines. In the circumstances both their stock and bond holders can well afford and ought to pay this tax.

Mr. Chairman, the conclusion is therefore inevitable that when we consider the laws, rules, methods, and conditions of modern business, but a limited number of the holders of great wealth would escape this tax.

As I stated to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a few moments ago, in 9 cases out of 10 it would be found that that same person, even if he is not performing a single business activity with respect to that property, is engaged in business in the sense of this bill with respect to other property or in some other respect as defined by the term "business."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] in his report on the sugar bill makes the following statement concerning the proposed bill:

> It would treat the right to work and its necessity as a franchise, the exercise of which should be taxed.

If this statement emanated from any other source less high and respectable I should characterize it as pure buncombe, the sole purpose of which is to divert attention from the real facts and merits of this bill. This is the same objection, differently phrased, that has so long done service for privilege against an income tax. Since Congress can not tax all incomes, it becomes necessary, in order to accomplish the same revenue purposes, to lodge the tax elsewhere and measure it by the income. In determining the merits of this tax the people will look at the results. Besides, this tax confers no right or privilege as to business which does not otherwise exist. The people know that all Government taxes fall on them. Of what concern to them is the name of a particular tax or of any tax? Their sole concern is that all taxes shall be for revenue and shall be imposed justly and fairly and according to ability to pay.

Let us compare for a moment the proposed tax with the present unspeakable Republican high-tariff tax. Our Republican tariff tax, for the benefit of the Sugar Trust, the Steel Trust, the Beef Trust, the Woolen Trust, and hundreds of other favored and fattened creatures of privilege, ruthlessly exacts of every citizen, including the millions who are in a state of poverty and hunger, a tax upon every bite of food he eats and upon every garment of clothing he wears. According to the logic of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Republican high-tariff tax treats the right to "eat" and to "wear clothes" as a franchise and places a heavy tax on its exercise, thereby creating the present high cost of living. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the other hand, the pending measure does not tax poverty or want; does not tax any human being unless he is "doing business" and has net annual earnings exceeding $5,000. This amount, when capitalized at the current rate of interest, is equivalent to property of more than $80,000. This method of tax lightens the burdens of those now so greatly overburdened by displacing pro tanto the odious protective tariff tax I have just described.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire briefly to discuss the administrative features of this bill. In drafting its administrative provisions the most desirable and practical features of similar tax laws were utilized. Under it no person becomes subject to any tax unless there is a remainder of his annual earnings left after deducting necessary expenses incurred in carrying on his business, all interest paid within the year on existing indebtedness, all national, State, county, school, and municipal taxes, all losses actually sustained during the year, incurred in trade, or arising from fires, storms, or shipwreck, and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, and debts warranted to be worthless, and also $5,000. Suitable and adequate provisions are contained in this measure requiring the making of returns in all proper cases; likewise suitable and adequate remedies in case of the making of false or fraudulent return by any person or an inadequate return. This act conforms to the corporation-tax law as to the time of making assessments, tax returns, and collections thereon. In addition to the remedies of both the Government and the taxpayer contained in this bill, the general law relating to the assessment and collection of internal revenue will be in force wherever applicable. Section 3167, for example, prohibits, under severe penalty, the divulging or making known in any manner not provided by law any phase of the business or other affairs of a taxpayer as set forth or disclosed in his tax returns, or in other manner. Notwithstanding these features which are intended to reduce the inquisitorial provisions to the minimum of annoyance or objection on the part of the taxpayer, it is contended by the opposition to this tax that its inquisitorialness constitutes a fatal objection to the tax.

I challenge a comparison of the methods of assessing and collecting this tax with those relating to both our State and National taxes. The inquisitorial features of our State tax laws are most rigid. They require the taxpayer to disclose, under both civil and criminal penalties, every kind and item of property possessed, even including heirlooms, trinkets, and jewelry belonging to members of the taxpayer's family. In many States these tax returns are made public and kept open for public inspection, notably in New York, Connecticut, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Hampshire. The right of personal search and seizure prevades our customs system of taxation, and the machinery of assessment and collection is necessarily intricate and exacting in a high degree.

I here call attention, Mr. Chairman, to section 3064 of the Revised Statutes, giving ample warrant for personal search and seizure:

> The Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe regulations for the search of persons and baggage and for the employment of female inspectors for the examination and search of persons of their own sex, and all persons coming into the United States from foreign countries shall be liable to detention and search by authorized officers and agents of the Government under such regulations.

Under this statute the newspapers of March, 1911, contained an account of the personal seizure and search of an American lady of the highest standing and character. Similar cases often arise. It seems that some irresponsible person in Europe wired an American customs agent that this lady was suspected of bringing in a diamond necklace. The following newspaper extract discloses the method of dealing with cases based upon such information. I omit the name:

> After the five trunks had been ordered sent away, Mrs. ——— was asked by Special Agent Wilson if she had a diamond necklace, and she declared that she knew nothing about any necklace. Wilson thereupon ordered a woman inspector to take Mrs. ——— and her daughter into a stateroom and search them thoroughly. Mrs. ——— said later, with tears, that she had been compelled to remove even her stockings. The search brought forth nothing dutiable.

I challenge the opposition to this tax to point out any features relating to its collection which compares with the workings of our customs-tax law with respect to inquisitorialness, search, and seizure. [Applause in the Democratic side.]

Furthermore, no honest person has a right to complain about reasonable regulations designed to prevent dishonesty. Neither have dishonest persons a right to make such complaint. I do not believe the proposed law would to a material extent increase dishonesty or falsehood in making tax returns, as opponents of this tax charge. Until the contrary is proven, I consider this intimation a slander against the possessors of large incomes in this country. I believe they now realize the wisdom and necessity, if they do not concede the justice, of bearing their fair share of burdens. However, if the objection offered be true in any measure it should not militate against the enactment and enforcement of this tax. To any dishonest taxpayer there should be applied the thumbscrews of the law. I both despise and pity those who place selfishness above morality, greed above honesty, and perjury above patriotism. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the chief difficulty originally experienced in the enactment of excise or income tax laws has been in their administration. However, other countries during recent years have developed the administrative features to a most satisfactory extent.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will let me make this statement I will be glad to yield to him later.

The proposed law contains in its administrative provisions a new feature known as "collection at the source." This method of levying and collecting the income tax resulted in doubling the revenue in England the first year after its adoption. England collects nearly $200,000,000 from an income tax. The law with its modernized administrative features works admirably.

The chief reason for its splendid success is its justice as a tax and the system of collection at the source. Its inquisitorial features are thus minimized and afford little cause for complaint. Under this stoppage at the source plan more than two-thirds of this tax is collected in England. It may be said that there is a vast difference between the antiquated income-tax machinery formerly in operation in this country and that contained in the pending bill by reason of the stoppage at the source feature.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. HULL. This provision of collection at the source is based upon the fact that all persons receive an income from some source. It is therefore provided that, wherever possible, the payer of the income shall withhold the tax due thereon and make payment to the Government. As to all incomes by which the tax is thus measured and paid the individual taxpayer is not required to make personal return. For example, the Government, corporations, copartnerships, and persons paying annual earnings to employees or other persons in excess of $5,000 would deduct and withhold the tax and pay to the Government. This method would likewise apply to mortgagors and lessees of real or personal property. By this method the taxpayer would not come in contact with a revenue official, nor would he have the opportunity or temptation to make a false or inadequate return of his income. This largely obviates the objection of inquisitorialness. As I have stated, comparatively little intangible personalty is reached and assessed for taxation. This stoppage-at-the-source method intercepts income therefrom. In my judgment, three-fourths of the tax derived under the proposed law would thus be collected. The United States affords excellent conditions for the successful operation of this system of collection. Unlike Great Britain and France, most of our wealth is kept at home. And the great number of firms, corporations, and other large business agencies peculiarly adapt this country to the easy collection of this excise tax at the source.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. This law does adopt, does it not, the general machinery for the collection of our present excise or internal revenue?

Mr. HULL. I just stated that, so far as they are applicable, the features of the general administrative internal revenue would be brought into use.

Mr. JACKSON. Does not the gentleman think that the severity of some of those methods compare very favorably with those of the internal-revenue machinery and with the processes that he has just described in the carrying out of the proposed law?

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Kansas, I do not know whether he is opposed to this kind of taxation or not, but I will be candid in saying to him that under the proposed measure, in my judgment, at least three-fourths of the taxes would be collected at the source of the income, so that the taxpayer would not even see an assessment or a revenue official.

And there is another provision which, under the most severe penalties, prohibits any Government official from disclosing any kind or character of information relative to the facts embraced within the tax returns of those officials. Ample provision is made for appeal in all cases from the decision of the lower revenue officials to the higher ones. Objections of a captious nature can be offered to any tax law when applied to the taxpayer who is undertaking to avoid the payment of his full taxes.

Mr. JACKSON. I wanted to call the attention of the gentleman, if he will permit, to one phase of the corporation-tax law. That law, as the gentleman will remember, provided for the same exemptions that this proposed law does, and the collector held that all corporations were compelled to report, and then he dug down and found a statute which permitted him to compromise penalties, and under these two provisions he has collected a penalty of from $15 to $35 from every corporation in the country which failed to file its report before the 1st of March. What I want to know of the gentleman is, Would not that same provision apply to this proposed law?

Mr. HULL. This bill provides that no person shall make an income return unless his income is over $4,500. There is no such exemption of corporations.

Mr. JACKSON. It was conceded that these corporations were not within the exemption.

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman will pardon me for not yielding further.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish Congress now had the power to enact a comprehensive graduated income tax with lower rates on earned and higher rates on unearned income. In the absence of such power Congress can only seek by a similar enactment to approximate that much-desired end. The present bill is not as I should have drafted it as an original proposition; but it was deemed wise, if not necessary, that in its terms it should conform to the corporation-tax law. This bill would impose just instead of unjust, honest instead of dishonest, taxation. More than any other agency it would equalize the burdens of Government, State, county, and municipal taxation. The tax is productive, cheap of collection, and the fairest and least burdensome of all taxes. This bill should become a law. The minds of the people are made up. They have determined to have fiscal reform in this country. In this behalf they propose to go on record next November. I have recently said in this House, and I repeat it now:

This country is approaching a tax revolution. The defenders of privilege, so long triumphant, can not turn back the tide of fiscal reform. Their opposition is a challenge to the civilization and representative government of our twentieth century. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Is our present hideous, monstrous system of taxation to go down in history as the culmination of centuries of Anglo-Saxon legislation? No. Some Pitt or Cobden, some Peel or Gladstone, will rise up and engage its champions in a battle to the death. And their ardent followers will constitute the best manhood and patriotism of this country—the type of citizenship that wrought out this Government, that has safely guided it through the trials and vicissitudes of more than 100 years, that has been its mainstay in the past and will be its glory in the future. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is recognized.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, we have just emerged from a battle in which the foes of protection are for the moment triumphant, and two great American industries lie bleeding in the dust.

But that is not all. Had the damage stopped there it would have been bad enough, but in the wake of the carnage follows also the destruction of one-fifth of our customs revenues. Sixty million dollars of the annual income of the Treasury has been thrown away, and it is the bill before us to-day that its proponents say is expected to make it up.

This is the twin, Mr. Chairman, that was born on the same day and conceived by the same brains as its brother, which has just emerged from its swaddling clothes so far as this House is concerned.

Can this bill do the work for which it was designed? That is the question which confronts us. By so much as it shall fall short of making good, by so much must it be adjudged a failure. If it shall not succeed in making good in any respect, then it were better that it had never been born.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, who is entitled to the laurel wreath as the victor of this battle. Of course, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] should lay claim to it, there is no one on that side, I assume, who would dispute him. But I can not help thinking that free sugar tastes more bitter than sweet to the gentleman from Alabama, and if he shall not claim the crown of victory, then the title of another gentleman on that side of the House is clear.

I doubt not that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] views with some complacency the high tribute paid to him the other day by a distinguished ex-Senator of the United States. It falls to the lot of a few men nowadays to hear themselves likened to Napoleon. But possibly this ex-Senator may have been wrong. It is clear to me that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in this case is entitled to call himself not only in fact but in theory "the Little Corporal." He has run over the gentleman from Alabama. He has forced him to abandon every principle that he has stood for since the gentleman from Alabama became chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Up to this time the gentleman from Alabama has opposed free trade constantly and consistently. He has maintained that practically every import should bear a duty for revenue purposes. He would not allow even pepper to remain on the free list, where it rightfully belongs, and where it has been since the Republican Party has been in control of legislation in this House. But when he came to sugar the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and his cohorts overwhelmed him, and all his plans for revenue duties have been swept away.

Not again in this Congress can the gentleman from Alabama maintain his former position. If it is unjust to tax sugar for revenue purposes, where is the justice in taxing pepper and other articles that have an equal place with sugar on the table of the average American citizen? The gentleman from Alabama voted for a duty of 29 per cent on wool, as did his followers on that side of the House. If a revenue duty on sugar is unjust, if it is unjust to tax some of the poor man's food, is it not equally unjust to tax his clothing? Every civilized country considers sugar as a legitimate revenue-producing article. Every other country but this, if this bill should be enacted, would still have a duty on sugar.

No country but this imposes a duty on raw wool. Does the majority of the Ways and Means Committee intend to bring in a bill to place wool on the free list? If not, why not? If this alleged excise income tax has the powers that you say it has of producing revenue, if it is going to pay for free sugar, why should you not make it pay for free wool? If, as you say, this excise tax of 1 per cent will raise $60,000,000, why not make the rate 2 per cent and raise $120,000,000? Then you can put on the free list wool and most articles of daily necessity, and perhaps we could even induce you to remove the duty on pepper. Why not make it 3 per cent or 4 per cent or 5 per cent, at which point you could afford to abolish the customhouses of this country altogether?

Gentlemen, why do you not make this tax higher if by doing so you can produce a revenue sufficient for the purposes I have named? It is because in your hearts you know that it will not raise the revenue you say it will or even a small fraction of it. You are not treating the American people fairly in this case, gentlemen. This bill is introduced purely for political purposes, and so far as the production of $60,000,000 revenue is concerned it is a fake pure and simple. The American people have intrusted you with control of legislation upon the floor of this House. They are entitled to expect at least serious constructive effort from you. This bill is not serious constructive effort. It is a farce upon its face, and it is a farce that may turn out in your case, gentleman, to be a tragedy.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] who has just taken his seat made a very plausible and able argument upon the constitutionality of this bill. But did any one of you hear him say a word about the figures upon which estimates of the majority were based? Not one word or figure appears in their report to show that this bill will raise the revenue they say it will. It is pure guesswork and it is bad guesswork. In our report we have given you the figures and the facts to prove the figures. We have laid our cards face up on the table. Why do you not do likewise? It is because you know that an investigation of this question by any fairly intelligent man will prove beyond any conceivable shadow of doubt that if your bill is constitutional in every single respect, which it is not, you could not raise 1 cent more than $20,000,000 a year. And when you eliminate the evidently unconstitutional features of this bill, those features admitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] to be unconstitutional, you will not raise more than ten, or at the outside fifteen, millions dollars under this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is not here, having just stepped out. I do not recall his admitting that there was any unconstitutional feature in this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Tennessee in his speech admitted that the tax upon the income received from real estate was not constitutional.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. He made an argument exactly to the contrary and showed that the Supreme Court had decided in the Flint and other corporation tax cases that any income from any source, real estate or otherwise, would be taxable, and he read the language of the Flint case, in which it declared that the point made as to the unconstitutionality of an income tax from real estate was not sound, and that we could tax incomes from real estate of corporations, although the real estate was not employed in the business at all. That is one of the main points decided by the Supreme Court.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I regret that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is not here, as I should dislike very much to misrepresent him, but I heard the gentleman quote with approval the decision of the Supreme of the United States in the Zonne case, in which the court held specifically that a corporation organized for the purpose of receiving rents from real estate and distributing them among its stockholders was not doing business within the terms of the act.

Mr. KITCHIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Supreme Court does not hold that at all. The Supreme Court declared in the very case cited by the gentleman from Ohio, the Zonne case, that a corporation organized for the purpose of owning and renting real estate would be taxable as to its income from such real estate; but that case went off on the point that the corporation had surrendered its corporate powers by amended charter, and had conveyed its property to individuals, and the court held it was no longer a corporation under the meaning of the act of 1909, because it had "wholly parted with control and management of the property"—these are the words of the court—of this source of income; that "the corporation had practically gone out of business with respect to the property and had disqualified itself by the terms of reorganization from any activity in connection with it," having conveyed it to individuals or trustees, and therefore the individuals or trustees were holding and renting it, and that the income from such real estate could not be taxed as income of a corporation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will have to ask the gentleman not to take up quite so much time.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is not here, and I wanted to keep the gentleman straight as to his contention and argument. I know the gentleman does not want to misrepresent the gentleman from Tennessee, and would not do it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course not.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman has not misrepresented him, but has misconstrued his position.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the gentleman from North Carolina takes up more time to apologize for what he took up before.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio some of my time, then.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the decision quoted with approval by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] it was held that a corporation which received rents from real estate and distributed them among its stockholders was not doing business as contemplated by the act. How much more would that be true of an individual? How could you tax an individual under this act one cent upon his income received from real estate? The Supreme Court has held specifically that this is not "business" when done by a corporation. How much less could it be construed as "business" in the case of an individual?

Why, Mr. Chairman, in their own report the majority of this committee say that idle wealth held by idle persons will escape taxation under this bill. No man can be taxed one cent upon the income he receives from a mortgage or a bond or a ground rent. I do not care whether you call it "business" income or what you call it; that is idle wealth in the hands of idle persons, and is exempt from taxation according to the report of the majority.

Now, I had not intended to discuss at this point the constitutionality of this bill. Before doing so I want to say a word about the revenue features of it. The constitutionality of this bill is not the most important question to be decided by this House. If this bill can not raise the revenue made necessary by the passage of the sugar bill, it makes little difference whether it be constitutional or not. If this bill can not raise over $20,000,000 revenue why should we pass it, whether it is constitutional or not? I challenge any gentleman upon that side of the House to show in any way, by any figures, that this bill will raise at the most as much as $20,000,000 a year. The mere supposition that there would remain in this country incomes, after eliminating the incomes specifically exempted, like those received from corporations netting more than $5,000 a year, incomes from State, municipal, and county bonds sufficient to raise this $60,000,000 is utterly and absolutely absurd.

Think of it for a moment, Mr. Chairman. You are forced to presuppose, and this bill presupposes, that there are in this country incomes, not including the income of anyone who has less than $5,000 a year, not including any incomes received from State, county, and municipal bonds, not including incomes received from stock in corporations that net more than $5,000 a year, amounting to the terrific total of $6,000,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would it interrupt the gentleman to read the case that the gentleman cited a little while ago, or about five lines of it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will be glad to do so a little later.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Has not the gentleman forgotten one other exception, and a very large one—and that is those incomes derived by individuals from corporate stock that he did not mention?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I included in the statement I have just made incomes received by persons having investments in stock of corporations which earn more than $5,000 a year. I certainly intended to do so, and think that I did.

To state the proposition in another way: If this bill is expected to reach incomes amounting to $6,000,000,000 a year we are forced to suppose that there is wealth in this country not touched by the corporation tax, not specifically exempted by this bill, that amounts to $150,000,000,000.

The immense amount of property owned by railroads, mining corporations, and the like; all the vast accumulations of wealth owned by individuals through any form of corporate organization; the total debt of all States, counties, and municipalities; every dollar's worth of property owned by any American citizen who has a "business" income of less than $5,000 a year—all these forms of wealth must be eliminated from our calculations of the sources from which the tax provided in this bill must be derived.

Is the proposition that there still remains $150,000,000,000 worth of property, producing on an average a net income of 4 per cent, to be taken seriously?

The last complete census figures I have been able to find show that the total national wealth of this country in 1904 was $107,000,000. The highest limit that I have heard placed upon our national wealth to-day is $130,000,000. Bear in mind that this includes every form of property owned by corporations as well as individuals, every form of property owned by individuals having incomes of less than $5,000 a year as well as those who are more prosperous.

And yet we are asked by the proponents of this bill to believe that the total wealth that will be reached by it, with all of its exemptions, exceeds the total wealth of the country by $30,000,000,000.

The majority of the Ways and Means Committee, in making their revenue estimate, say in the report:

Due consideration has also been taken of the results of the experience of other countries in raising revenue from similar taxes.

A few moments ago the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] said that the British income tax produces nearly $200,000,000 a year. As a matter of fact, he slightly swelled the figures. The largest amount ever raised under the British income-tax law was $180,000,000 a year. But he neglected to state that the rate in Great Britain is 6 per cent and not 1 per cent, and that all incomes are taxed which exceed $800 a year and not $5,000 a year, as in this bill.

I have taken the pains to calculate the amount that this tax would raise if applied to Great Britain. The gentleman from Tennessee has told us of the marvelous machinery that Great Britain has for determining the incomes of her citizens in such a way that "no guilty man may escape."

Let us take the case of Great Britain. Let us see what revenue would be produced there under the tax proposed in this bill. The total incomes of Great Britain in 1910 from all sources amounted to £1,000,000,000, in round numbers, or $5,000,000,000. Of that one billion, $400,000, or about 28 per cent, was income from real estate; $240,000,000, or 5 per cent, was income from Government securities, foreign and domestic; and $3,340,000,000, or 67 per cent, was income from business corporations, professions, employments, and so forth, the sort of income that this bill seeks to tax.

The figures are not available to show what deductions can be made in the incomes between $800 and $5,000 in relation to real estate, but they are available as relates to all other incomes in Great Britain. They show that the total income of persons having not less than $800 a year and not over $5,000 a year was $400,000,000. The total income of firms was $75,000,000; of officials, $5,000,000; and employees, $625,000,000. In addition to this sum of $105,000,000 we must also deduct the income from corporations having more than $5,000 a year. That amounts to $1,275,000,000, so that there is remaining, of incomes in Great Britain which would be subject to this tax, $960,000,000, on which this tax would raise a revenue of $9,600,000 a year. Adding the amount which could reasonably be expected from the remaining 33 per cent, including incomes from real estate and Government securities, we would have then a total sum upon which this tax could be assessed of $1,400,000,000, on which this tax would raise a total revenue of $14,000,000 a year. Can it be reasonably supposed that the tax proposed in this bill will raise more than four times as much here as it would in Great Britain? Merely to state the proposition is to show its absurdity. Mr. Chairman, this $60,000,000 of revenue is a pipe dream. When we see in the colored supplements of the papers to-morrow pictures illustrating Little Nemo's adventures in Slumberland, we shall not see anything more absurd than these figures.

"The jabberwock," which, "with eyes of flame Went whiffling through the tulgy wood and burbled as it came,"

was no more a figment of a vivid imagination than these $60,000,000 a year are. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Let us take another example of the utter farcicality of the estimates of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means. If we are to assume that $6,000,000,000 a year is the income upon which this tax could be levied, we would have to assume that the number of individuals having an income of $10,000 a year was 1,200,000. Is there anyone that would not laugh if it was said seriously to him that there were 1,200,000 people in this country—one-ninetieth or more of our population—who have incomes of $10,000 a year each? We would have to assume that there are 133,000 people who have an income of over $50,000 a year; that there are 6,000 American citizens who have an income of over a million dollars a year, or that there were 600 persons in this country who had an income of $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. If under the terms of this bill it will not raise more revenue than $14,000,000, who is the bill going to hurt, if passed?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the gentleman does not apprehend the argument I am making a little better than that. I am not talking about who it is going to hurt. I am talking about whether it is going to help the country. I am arguing against the advisability of passing such legislation as this to make up a deficit in the revenues of $60,000,000 a year.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to ask another question, if the gentleman will yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will tell the gentleman, though, whom it will hurt. It will hurt simply the active, energetic men of this country who by their brains and energy are making a livelihood for themselves and for their families. It will not hurt any single idle holder of idle wealth, whether Mr. Carnegie, Mr. Rockefeller, or Mr. Astor, or whoever he may be, who is living on the income of his invested capital. It will not hurt them, if that is what the gentleman wants to know.

Mr. POWERS. I am seeking information, and I would like to have the gentleman's reasons for failing to increase the excise tax from 1 per cent to 2 per cent. He has based his argument largely upon the proposition that a tax of 1 per cent is not sufficient to raise sufficient revenue to justify the bill. I would like to have some argument produced showing that the excise tax in itself is a wrong principle.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am coming to that later, if the gentleman will wait. I ask not to be interrupted any more for the present. We have proved, and we have proved beyond the shadow of a doubt, and nobody has denied it, and nobody is going to deny it, I think, that this bill will not, even if constitutional in every respect, raise over $20,000,000 a year. That is on the assumption that the Supreme Court would uphold the tax on every income that it assumes to impose. From that sum must be eliminated what will go through the loopholes of this bill, and there are many loopholes. I shall not take time to go into that question except to ask that gentlemen read the letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which is quoted on page 5 of the minority report, and which I append here. The tables to which Mr. Cabell refers are to be found in the minority report.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 9, 1912.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LONGWORTH: Referring to our conversation this morning relative to the Democratic caucus bill extending the provisions of the excise-tax law to all individuals, firms, etc., engaged in business, I beg to state that I have read this bill with considerable care and great interest.

This office had its first information relative to the bill in the newspaper reports announcing its adoption, and I have made considerable efforts to locate any data based on which the receipts from the bill could be estimated. After making inquiry from every source that I could think of, I have reached the conclusion that there is no very comprehensive data in existence. I had certain persons who are experienced in work of this nature make estimates from the data obtainable as to the probable tax-producing properties of the bill, without raising any question as to probable exemptions, exceptions, defects in language, apparent opportunities afforded to evade the tax, etc. I inclose herein a memorandum giving a brief synopsis of these estimates. You will note that the largest amount believed possible to be collected under this measure is $26,500,000 a year. If the bill is adopted in its present language, this possible amount appears certain to be reduced very greatly; in my judgment, below $20,000,000 per annum.

My principal criticisms of the language of the bill would be that the definition of the word "person" is not sufficiently embracive; the language would appear to except trusts, trustees, and associations, and then, most important of all, it does not embrace families. Taken in connection with a later paragraph of the bill, which states that no person receiving less than $4,500 need make a return, this definition would permit a man to divide his income, unless it were in the shape of a salary or something which attached purely to himself personally, among all of the members of his family, each receiving less than $4,500, and no one of these members would be required to make a return. He himself then would only have to report what would be left over and would be allowed a deduction of $5,000 from that. I am of opinion that this would afford an open door through which probably 25 per cent of the tax, which would otherwise be collected, would slip out.

Again, it is provided that the question of tax liability, or liability to make a return, shall be determined by the deputy collector or collectors, and it would appear that a decision in favor of a taxpayer by a deputy collector would be binding and final. I am of opinion that any provision such as this would make any law incapable of satisfactory administration.

If the proposed measure is to be enacted into law, I am of opinion that provision should be made for each "person" liable thereunder to make the return at the close of the fiscal year of the business conducted by such person rather than at the close of the calendar year.

There are numbers of other matters in the bill of more or less importance that appear to be subject to criticism, but I am giving you only what I consider the most vital administrative propositions, not touching at all the many interesting and complicated legal questions involved in this proposed legislation.

With highest regards, I am,
Respectfully, R. E. CABELL, Commissioner.

Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to discuss, and I do not intend to discuss at any length, the constitutionality of this measure. I am not prepared to say it is unconstitutional in every respect, though I think a fair argument could be made to show that it is, but I do claim that so much of it as levies a tax, call it a business tax or by whatever other name you wish, upon the income derived from real estate or from invested capital is unconstitutional. The Zonne case, to which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] referred, was a case where a corporation originally was chartered for the purpose of improving and holding real estate and erecting buildings thereon. Subsequently it leased the property to trustees and reserved merely the right to collect that income and distribute it among its stockholders.

Mr. LITTLETON. The lease ran for 130 years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; for 130 years. The court held that that corporation was not doing business in a way that would bring it under the provisions of the corporation-tax law. Without going at any length into this question I desire to refer to a case decided by the Supreme Court of Alabama, which is precisely in point. That is the case of State v. Anniston Rolling Mills (125 Ala., 121).

The rolling mill company was organized to manufacture and deal in iron products. It leased its plant to another corporation. It still collected rent, paid taxes, loaned money, and collected interest, and did certain other things looking to the preservation of its property. It was held by the court not to be liable to a license tax, upon the theory that it was not doing business, and the court said:

Not one of the several acts of the corporation done by it in the year 1897, as shown by the record, constituted a doing of the business or any part of the business for which it was created, and were incidents to the preservation of its property.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the lessees be liable for the tax in that case?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not see how they could be under this bill.

Mr. LITTLETON. That was an occupation tax by a license.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. I quote it only as showing what a proper definition of the term "business" is. I do not think that anyone will claim that under this law the receipt of income from a ground rent would be taxable. Take a case where a man leases real estate perpetually, or for some stated period under a lease which provides that the lessee shall pay the taxes, assessments, and so forth. Will anyone claim that under this bill his income from the lease could be taxed? That is the kind of investment that many persons make when they retire from business. It is a form of investment which men leave to their families.

The income from this sort of investment would amount to many million dollars a year, and under this law such incomes would be absolutely exempt from taxation. So that if the courts should hold, as we think they undoubtedly would, that incomes from real estate and permanent investments can not be taxed under this bill, a large deduction would have to be made from even the comparatively paltry sum that any reasonable estimate will show its revenue-producing powers to be. The more carefully we examine the figures the more the revenues shrink. It is doubtful whether this bill, after being submitted to the scrutiny of the courts, would yield as much as $15,000,000 a year, and it is not beyond the bounds of reasonable probability that the whole fabric might fall to the ground.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman speaks of income from real estate. Did not the Supreme Court hold in the rehearing in the Pollock case that the same rule was to be applied on income from real estate as income from personal property? At the rehearing they made no distinction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. The question would be in every case whether the person was transacting business.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If he was actually transacting business he would probably be taxed under this bill. If he was not transacting business he could not be taxed under this bill.

Mr. MANN. Under the corporation-tax case, if he is transacting business he might be taxed on his total income, whatever the sources of the income might be. The question, then, is, What is the transaction of business? Has the gentleman gone into that? Is collecting interest due him on a loan, business? Is living in a house, business? Is living on earth at all, business?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I put a case to a gentleman on the other side a few days ago who believed that the receipt of income from real estate was doing business. He claimed that the opening of an envelope that contained a check constituted a doing of business in real estate. I put to him this case, "Supposing a woman secures a divorce from her husband and is allowed under the decision of the court $10,000 a year alimony, is she to be compelled to pay a tax under this bill for doing business; and, if so, what business?" The answer was vague. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, the question was vague. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. At the very best, and assuming that this bill is all that its proponents claim it is, far as revenue producing is concerned, it is foreordained to failure. And while I dislike to say anything disagreeable or sarcastic about any measure brought in here by my colleagues of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, whom I regard and respect most highly, I feel absolutely justified in saying that this bill is a total and absolute fraud.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but will the gentleman allow me to say that, admitting that to be true——

Mr. LONGWORTH. And as the gentleman does admit, I hope.

Mr. CANNON. I think so. But take the other side of the House—the majority—do you not think that they think it is "a good enough Morgan until after the election"? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Without answering the gentleman specifically, I think there is some politics in this bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it not likely to be "a good enough Morgan after the election" for some who vote against it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be quite willing that the only issue between the two parties should be this bill. If it were, we would not see the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] here after the election.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hope the gentleman will not conclude without answering the question asked by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am about to come to that feature of the discussion, which I think I can answer to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. While the majority say this measure is not on its face an income tax, the whole burden of their argument is to prove that it is one in effect, and that it will lead up to a perhaps more carefully considered income-tax law so soon as the necessary number of States shall have ratified the constitutional amendment submitted to them by the last Congress.

But what kind of an income tax do they mean? For what sort of a law can this be regarded as a precedent? Is it the intention of the majority to pass a law which shall exempt from any share in the taxation 95 per cent of the American people and include in that exemption the rich, who live in idleness upon their income from invested property? Is it intended that only those who are using their energies and brains shall pay the tax and that the drones and the idlers go free?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if that is not precisely what the Payne-Aldrich bill did with reference to the corporations?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not at all. There are very few corporations worth considering which have an income less than $5,000 a year, as the returns show; but there are thousands of people in this country who have incomes of less than $5,000 a year. Now, I am coming to that precise point in just a moment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will you allow me a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will pardon me for a moment. I am going to speak first about the precedent for the exemption of incomes, and then I will be glad to yield.

This bill exempts incomes of $5,000 a year and under. Gentlemen speak with praise of the income tax in Great Britain and of its fairness and effectiveness in that and other countries in producing revenue. There is not another civilized country in the world, Mr. Chairman, that exempts incomes of more than $1,000 a year.

In Australia the exemption is $1,000; in Great Britain, $800; in Germany, $750; in India, $666; in Denmark, $214; in Japan, $150; and in Switzerland, which many speak of as the ideal Republic, the exemption is $120 a year. In other words, it has been found just in those countries which have tried the income tax that a fair share of the population should be called upon to pay it. In my judgment, an exemption as high as $5,000 is essentially unrepublican and undemocratic. I believe that the mass of the people in any Republic, or a large portion of them at least, should have a direct interest in keeping down the expenditures of their Government. I do not mean to say that I believe that the small man should pay as much as the big man, even proportionately. I would tax those who receive large incomes at a higher rate than those who receive small incomes, but I would not exempt incomes of a reasonable size from all taxation whatever. In my judgment, an exemption of as high as $5,000 a year is essentially class legislation.

Mr. LITTLETON. I would like to ask a question for information. Did you find out how many corporations there were that did not report under the corporation act? I could not find out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under our corporation tax?

Mr. LITTLETON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; but I think it is believed that practically every corporation of any size made report. The total of reports last year showed an income of $3,336,000,000, if I rightly remember.

Mr. LITTLETON. They paid on that?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The tax collected was something over $29,000,000, showing that those not taxed were corporations that were exempt for one reason or another, either for holding real estate or having incomes less than $5,000. The amount was relatively insignificant.

But gentlemen say that a high exemption will be "popular." Of course, the higher you put the exemption, the more popular the tax will be.

Any tax is always popular with those who do not have to pay it, and it is unpopular in a certain sense with those who do have to pay it. But, following the logic of that argument, it would be wiser and more popular to exempt incomes of $10,000 a year, or $15,000 a year, and so on up. But that is not the kind of popularity that a statesman should seek to attain for an income tax or any other tax. The test should be not popularity, but fairness. I do not believe that the average American citizen objects to paying his fair share of the burden of supporting his Government. He does not ask to be entirely exempted. He simply asks to be fairly treated. He does not ask for charity; he asks for a square deal.

Now, there is another feature of this bill to which I have as serious objection as I have to the size of the exemption, and that is the quality of the exemption. I mean the proposition that energy and enterprise are to be taxed and that idleness is to go free. In many enlightened countries a substantial distinction is made between earned and unearned incomes. In Great Britain professional incomes, incomes that are earned by activity, pay a tax 25 per cent less than unearned incomes or incomes derived from invested property.

In Australia the difference is even greater. I find that in Australia the taxation on incomes derived from "personal exertions" is only one-half that on incomes derived from investments. That is a proper and just distinction, and should be made in any income tax law, in my judgment. The man who earns his income by the exercise of his brains or by the sweat of his brow is all the time exhausting his capital. In the nature of things his earning capacity is limited by the fund of energy upon which he must draw, and at some time or other that fund must become depleted and eventually entirely exhausted. On the other hand, the man whose income is derived from property, comes to him without any energy or activity on his part, and does not impair his capital, which in some cases not only does not decrease, but increases in value. It is not fair that he should not pay more from his annual income than his neighbor, whose earning power may be soon exhausted.

This bill adopts precisely the opposite policy. Not only does it not distinguish in favor of the earner, as against the idler, but it actually penalizes him. It taxes the earner and lets the idler go free. Under this bill not a cent of tax could be collected from a man who has inherited property and lives on the income derived from it. Not a cent of tax could be collected from the man who has retired from business and is living on the income from his invested gains.

What can be said in favor of a tax law which lets the Rockefellers and the Carnegies and the Astors go free, but which taxes the man who in the full maturity of his powers is devoting his best energies to the service of his Government, like, for instance, the honored Speaker of this House; which taxes the men who are devoting their lives to the preservation of the integrity and honor of their country, like the officers of the Army and Navy; which taxes the lawyer and the physician and the clergyman and every man who is earning his bread by his brains or the sweat of his brow?

I see no justification for the passage, either as a revenue measure or for any other purpose, of a law which makes such unjust discriminations as does this bill.

I am opposed to this bill, and I am opposed to any proposition for which it might be regarded as a legitimate precedent. If we are to have an income tax, let us have one that is modeled——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes' additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If we are to have an income tax, Mr. Chairman, let us have one that is modeled on the laws of other countries, where it is an integral part of their revenue system, and where it has been shown by experience to be fair and just. Let us in the meantime oppose such measures as this, invented upon the spur of the moment, brought in for political reasons only, evidently not effective to carry out the purposes for which it was intended, and which from any point of view is unjust, unfair, and inequitable. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time, and ask unanimous consent to be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to speak so early on this bill, but opportunity having been given me by the majority leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to speak this afternoon rather than later in the debate, I desire to say that I am heartily in favor of this bill, which seeks "to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, so that every person, firm, or copartnership residing in the United States, any Territory thereof, or in Alaska or the District of Columbia shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such person, equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by such person from all sources during each year," and I hope that the bill will be permitted to become a law and that it will stand the test in the courts, and that before very long the general income tax amendment will be adopted and a general income tax become a part of the law of the land.

In orderly society, secured by well-organized government and just laws, peculiar benefits come to those possessed of large means and incomes flowing therefrom. The peculiar benefits that government secures to wealth are in addition to those benefits that are common to all the people, who are supposed to enjoy under the law equal protection as to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness. Great property interests are especially favored, and a large proportion of the expenses of government is for the protection of property owned and controlled by the wealthier classes, who invest their surplus means at home and abroad, understanding that the strong arm of the Government will be used to protect their property interests and investments wherever situate, and it is not unreasonable to insist that a fair share of the burdens of government shall be borne by the wealth of the country, and a moderate tax levied upon large incomes is both fair and just, and should be paid without complaint by those who reap and enjoy the greatest benefits of government.

This country stands almost alone among the so-called civilized nations in failing to tax incomes for the support of the Government. In the year 1908—and I have not before me later figures—the amount of income tax collected was, in round numbers, $413,000,000. In this respect England stands at the head of the list with $165,000,000. Other countries stood as follows:

Prussia	$88,000,000
Italy	50,000,000
Spain	18,000,000
Japan	13,800,000
Saxony	12,275,000
Austria	12,000,000
Holland, India, Norway, each nearly	7,000,000

England reached the sum of $180,000,000. However, it seems the per cent was greater, and levied upon sums exceeding a smaller amount, than named in this bill—so moderate in its exactions that none ought to complain.

In 1866 corporations paid more than one-eighth of the whole income tax, under the last existing income-tax law of the United States, which was repealed nearly 40 years ago.

In 1910 a 1 per cent tax on corporations yielded $27,000,000. If the proportion between individual and corporate wealth Later, the amount of revenues raised by tax on incomes in were substantially the same now as then, a Federal income tax of 1 per cent might be expected to yield $200,000,000. Yet I doubt the proportion being the same in 1910 and now as in 1866, corporations having multiplied more rapidly in later years.

How enormous is the wealth of this country, and untaxed for support of the Federal Government, and more than half of this wealth owned by a very small per cent of the population of the country enjoying large incomes free from taxation for Federal purposes.

The advocates of a general income tax have hoped that the day was not far distant when three-fourths of the States of the Union would ratify the proposed income-tax resolution, thereby amending the Constitution of the United States so that a law might be enacted by Congress whereby a general income tax might become the law of the land and whereby the burdens of taxation would be more evenly distributed. With a changed attitude on the part of the President toward income-tax legislation in time of peace, the adoption by the States of the income-tax amendment is discouraged by the very utterances of the President, finding active response among the leaders of his party in the several States, even going so far as to attempt to reverse the prior action of the State of New York, the wealthiest of all the States, and thereby, if successful, to prevent, possibly, any further progress toward the amendment of the Constitution of the United States for income-tax purposes.

I will quote a press dispatch:

RESCINDS INCOME-TAX VOTE—NEW YORK ASSEMBLY NOW REVERSES APPROVAL OF A YEAR AGO.

ALBANY, N. Y., March 13.

The assembly to-day, by a vote of 85 to 58, passed the Hinman bill, rescinding New York State's action of last year advocating a Federal income tax.

Arguments closely followed those of a year ago, when the legislature went on record as favoring the proposed constitutional amendment.

It takes three-fourths of the States of the Union, acting through their legislatures, to amend the Federal Constitution. Progress had so far been made in the States toward the adoption of this income-tax amendment that it required affirmative action of only 5 more States prior to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union of States, and by reason of their admission into the Union at this time it will now require 6 more States to ratify this amendment before it can be adopted as a part of the Constitution of the United States. Prior to their admission there were 46 States, and it was necessary that 35 States adopt the amendment in order to have the necessary three-fourths. The legislatures of 30 States have acted affirmatively. Sixteen States had either rejected the amendment or had failed to act. Mexico and Arizona admitted into the Union increases the number of States to 48 and increases the number of States which have not adopted the amendment to 18. Thirty-six States now constitute three-fourths of all the States. If 6 of these 18 States shall ratify the amendment, it will make the necessary three-fourths of 48, or 36 to 12.

The adoption of this constitutional amendment would hasten the beginning of a new fiscal policy—a policy of gradual reduction of tariff taxation made possible by resorting to income taxation. It will end the high protective-tariff system of this country and give to the people lower tariff laws and ultimately a tariff for revenue only—the goal of Democratic effort—and the country will readily understand why the highly protected interests seek to defeat income-tax legislation, and why Republican advocates of the high protection policy join hands with special interests in their efforts to postpone the day of the adoption of a general income-tax law as a permanent part of our fiscal policy.

The President of the United States, by his more recent utterances, lends his great voice and the influence of his administration to the delay in the adoption of this constitutional amendment. Such is the action of those who control the policies of the Republican Party. A large standing Army on land, and a fleet of monster battlements plow the waters of the seas, all in time of peace, costing annually hundreds of millions of dollars, to protect the property and wealth of those who would swell the annual appropriations for their protection, and yet not willing to bear a reasonable income tax in time of peace—this Republic standing alone of the civilized nations of the world in avoiding the levying an income tax.

We are preparing for war in time of peace, and why should not this annual burden of preparation for war be borne in part by those who admittedly should help bear the burden in time of peace?

The Democratic Party, now in control of the House of Representatives, wearied with long waiting, anxious to hasten the day for lower taxation, anxious to make an honest effort to balance the weight of taxation on consumers of the country, who have heretofore borne all the burdens of taxation, seeks now to so extend the present corporation tax to persons, firms, and copartnerships that there may shortly be raised revenue from large incomes, while at the same time an effort is made to give cheaper sugar to all consumers of this great necessity that enters into the daily consumption of every household in the land. And this income tax should not be opposed as class legislation, but rather indorsed as an effort to equalize the burdens of Government.

I have called attention to the recent action of the New York Assembly, seeking to reverse the prior action of the legislature of that State in 1911 in adopting the income-tax amendment. I desire to say in this connection that when the State of New York, in 1911, ratified that amendment, the legislature was Democratic, and that the present assembly, or lower house, of the legislature of that State is Republican, and one of its first acts was the introduction of a resolution seeking to rescind the former action by a Democratic legislature. It has been understood that a vote against ratification does not preclude a ratification at a later date, but that a vote in favor of ratification is final and can not be recalled or rescinded; and that there is no limit upon the period within which an amendment to the Constitution may be ratified, and that it is beyond the power of Congress to recall an amendment which has once been submitted to the States.

As against this doctrine that a vote in favor of ratification is final, and can not be recalled or rescinded, in January, 1912, a concurrent resolution rescinding the action of the New York Legislature of 1911 in ratifying the proposed income-tax amendment to the Federal Constitution was introduced by Assemblyman Hinman, chairman of the judiciary committee. It asked the Federal Secretary of State to return the copy of last year's resolution now on file in Washington, and recites, that as the amendment has not been ratified by three-fourths of the States, it has not become part of the Constitution. The resolution declares there is no emergency calling for the immediate passage of the proposed amendment. Mr. Hinman says that an investigation of precedents for rescinding of action reveals the fact that there has never been a real test in court.

On March 6 the Hinman resolution rescinding New York State's approval of the Federal income-tax resolution was reported favorably by the assembly judiciary committee, and Mr. Hinman issued a statement saying that there was no precedent against rescinding which can be said to have determined that a State has no such right—and further says Congress can not decide this question, nor can the secretary of state, by the adoption of a resolution, declare that New York has irrevocably given its assent or by any kind of promulgation, that it is not a political question but a judicial one for the court. Such is the recent utterance of this Republican leader in the Republican Assembly of the State of New York. And on March 13—three days ago—the Hinman resolution passed the assembly by a vote of 85 to 58.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will my friend permit an interruption?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman doubtless recalls the historical fact that when the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were up for ratification by the States, the States of Ohio and New Jersey ratified the amendments and then withdrew that ratification, and the Secretary of State and Congress refused to recognize such later action of the legislatures of the two States.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am familiar in part with that history. I recollect when I came here, nearly two years ago, being over in the other body and listening to a distinguished Senator, now an ex-Senator, from Mississippi, Senator Money, in an address before the Senate, in which he referred to that fact while discussing a joint resolution directing the Attorney General to submit to the Supreme Court all information available bearing on the validity of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, seeking to test whether the fourteenth amendment was adopted according to the requirements of the Constitution and whether or not this is a judicial question. By the action of the New York Assembly they seek to bring that question anew before the courts of the land for the purpose of taking New York out of the list of those States that have ratified the income-tax amendment.

So, while the party of which I am an humble member is seeking, with a percentage of the Republicans of the country, to press forward the enactment of an income-tax amendment and to secure the ratification of this amendment by three-fourths of the States of this Union, an effort is being made in at least one State, the wealthiest of all, to recede from that position, thereby, if successful, retarding and delaying the time, if not preventing the time from ever coming, when an income-tax-amendment resolution shall become a part of the fundamental law of the land.

There are to-day in this country two great contending forces, the masses on the one hand, the overwhelming majority of the people, who are pressing forward the thought that an income tax ought to be a part of the law of this Republic, as in all other of the most civilized countries of the world; but the thought has been in my mind, and doubtless in the minds of some of you at least, that the time, perhaps, is far distant when three-fourths of the States possibly will ratify this amendment to the end that it will become a part of the Constitution of the United States. When they do, then litigation will come, and the question raised in New York may be before the courts for judicial determination. The question is even suggested in a letter that I received this morning from the Secretary of State, when I inquired as to the number of States and the names of those that had ratified this amendment. I have here his letter naming 29 States, out of which the State of Kentucky is left, on the idea that there is some doubt about its having legally adopted it.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Kentucky or New York?

Mr. DICKINSON. Kentucky. The question arose, with which this House is somewhat familiar, that in the State of Arkansas the governor saw fit to veto the action of the legislature; though I will say that in the list furnished me by the Secretary of State the State of Arkansas is included as one of the 29 States. I do not believe that any lawyer in this body has any reasonable doubt but that the action of the legislature is the final and only necessary action required for the purpose of ratifying the income-tax amendment or other amendment to the Constitution and not subject to the veto of the governor.

If the President of these United States has less interest in the adoption of an income-tax amendment to the Constitution than he had prior to his election, it is a source of regret; but it is significant that only a few months ago he declared that he does not favor the enactment of an income tax except for raising revenue in time of war; that he is opposed to the collection of an income tax in time of peace. In this position the President is not in accord with the majority sentiment of the country.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DICKINSON. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I should like to ask the gentleman to give his idea as to what would likely be the effect upon the States that have not yet ratified the constitutional amendment should Congress pass the law which is now under consideration?

Mr. DICKINSON. What would be the legal effect?

Mr. TOWNER. No; what would be the likely effect on the States that have not yet acted?

Mr. DICKINSON. I was about to reach that question. I thank the gentleman for asking it. I was about to congratulate the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee for having brought forward this measure at this time when the country is becoming wearied by reason of the fact that the general income-tax amendment proposition is lagging because of inaction on the part of some of the States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have reached the conclusion in my own mind that the action of this House and of this Congress in pressing forward as far as they can, by reason of the limitations resulting from the decision of the Supreme Court, and attempting to extend the excise tax to persons as well as corporations, will renew again the interest of all the people favoring a general income tax, and will tend to quicken action in the several States that have not yet acted, to the end that a sufficient number of them will more speedily, through their legislatures, ratify this amendment, so that three-fourths will ratify more quickly than if this Congress showed no interest in pressing forward in favor of levying taxes upon incomes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe that the action of Congress on this bill will quicken the interest of the people everywhere, and a renewed demand will be made for an early ratification of the general income-tax amendment, so that the large incomes from every source may be reached, some of which can not be reached by this proposed law, by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring unconstitutional a general income-tax law.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. DICKINSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman think that really encouraging progress is being made when he realizes that during the year 1910 nine States ratified, and during the year 1911 20 or 21 more States have ratified that constitutional amendment? Does not the gentleman think it is commendable progress in that direction?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; we are making progress; but I have always believed that the progress toward the end would be so slow, the opposition in several States would be so strong, that it might take a longer time to gain the last half dozen States than it did to gain the 30 that have ratified it. I have believed that by reason of the opposition of the great interests, and those in high authority losing their interest in favor of the enactment of the proposed income-tax amendment, that the delay would be increased. I want to say here, from the history of this present law now upon the statute books, that it was understood that the corporation-tax law was brought forward and enacted into law primarily for the purpose of defeating the general income-tax law sought by Democrats to be enacted at that time, and I shall print with my remarks a partial history of the passage of said law.

Such were the utterances of a distinguished leader in the Senate of the United States when this was being discussed; such was the frank admission of Republican leaders at that time.

Mr. BOWMAN. But this bill was not brought forward for that purpose?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am talking about the law now on the statute books, the corporation-tax law, which we are seeking to extend to persons. A law passed as a temporary measure, with the hope of its advocates that it would be adandoned after a brief while, though stated by others at the time that if this corporation-tax law went on the statute books, it was there to stay. The action of the Democratic Party in this House emphasizes the thought that it will not be abandoned, but that the law will be extended by levying a tax upon the net incomes over $5,000 of persons, as well as corporations, and remain as the law, at least, until a general income tax can be enacted. We are pressing forward here and before the country the idea that the Democratic Party is in favor of taxing large incomes, and this legislation is brought forward now because a general income-tax law has not been ratified by a sufficient number of States, and the tax sought to be taken off of sugar is sought to be put on incomes—taken off of the stomachs of the people and placed on large incomes, and easily paid.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman find any opposition in his State to the levying of an income tax, either upon corporations or individuals, by the General Government?

Mr. DICKINSON. I suppose there is opposition in every State, but my views are so well known on the subject of income taxes that no one has seen fit to express this opposition to me. There are always those who do not want to pay taxes. Nobody is anxious to pay taxes. Those enjoying large incomes, as a rule, doubtless prefer exemption from taxation and that the burden be upon consumers, but those who enjoy the protection of the Government and just laws should be willing to pay reasonable taxes, whether by reason of the property they own or by reason of protection of life and liberty.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have had much objection along this line, if the gentleman will permit me. There is a great demand in our State for improvement in roads and for pensions and all that sort of thing, and all sources of taxation are being resorted to that are possible. They have protested against the corporation tax and against our appropriating an income tax. They want to levy that income tax for the State as a source of revenue.

Mr. DICKINSON. That may be true in a measure in the State of Kansas, but I do not believe there is very much difference on this subject between your State and mine. Both Missouri and Kansas have ratified the general income-tax amendment, and I believe that the large majority of the people in both States favor the levying of an income tax upon both corporations and persons by the General Government.

Those who seek to avoid a Federal income tax by appealing to the States to reserve to themselves the exclusive right of income taxation know full well how easily those enjoying large incomes can escape State taxation, and know that the Federal Government would have a distinct advantage in that, the tax being uniform throughout the United States, there would be no escape from it by moving from one State to another, and a collection of it be more thorough and efficient; and so much of the business of importance transcends States lines that collection from such business would be more effective by the General Government, which is now compelled to rely almost exclusively upon customs and excises for its revenues. It needs income taxes if it would reduce excessive custom duties and more equally distribute the burdens of taxation. The appeal to the States is a selfish appeal by those seeking to avoid all taxation of such wealth as they can place beyond the reach of the tax collector.

The Democratic Party favors a general income-tax law, as shown by its national platform and by the record of its representatives here and elsewhere.

I have spoken of the changed attitude of President Taft regarding a general income tax, which logically would interfere with high-tariff laws. When Mr. Taft accepted the nomination for President, he declared his belief that an income tax properly drawn would be declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States and that in his judgment an amendment to the Constitution for an income tax was not necessary.

We sincerely hope that this bill, proposed by the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee and indorsed by the Democratic caucus, will be passed by so large a majority vote in both Houses of the Congress that the President will sign the bill, so that it may become a law.

In the magazine known as The Outlook, in its issue of December 2, 1911, appears an authorized interview with President Taft, given out at the Virginia Hot Springs, where he had gone for a rest after his notable tour of the West, lasting "49 days, with 306 speeches to his credit." In this interview President Taft was asked the following question:

> Now that you have launched your project for a constitutional amendment, you probably have in mind some particular form of general income tax to recommend to Congress when it is free to act?

To which question he replied:

> In a way; yes. I believe, on principle, in a general income tax. The only good arguments against it are that it is inquisitorial and that it offers a temptation to perjury. But I would not resort to the ordinary income tax except in an emergency like war, when I would have it graduated, so that those citizens who had most at stake should bear a correspondingly large share of the burden of the common defense. In time of peace I would avoid temptation to perjury and would confine the Government to taxes that do not involve such inquisitorial methods in their collection.

Fresh in the recollection of the American public is another and far different utterance by Mr. Taft when asking for the confidence and suffrages of the American people in the presidential campaign of 1908. After his nomination for President by the Republican national convention, June 18, 1908, which made no mention of the income tax in its platform, the Democratic national convention, held at Denver in July, 1908, adopted the following plank:

> We favor an income tax as part of our revenue system, and we urge the submission of a constitutional amendment specifically authorizing Congress to levy and collect a tax upon individual and corporate incomes, to the end that wealth may bear its proportionate share of the burdens of the Federal Government.

In his speech of acceptance at Cincinnati, July 28, 1908, President Taft expressed the same idea as follows:

> The Democratic platform demands two constitutional amendments, one providing for an income tax and the other for an election of Senators by the people. In my judgment an amendment to the Constitution for an income tax is not necessary. I believe that an income tax, when the protective system of customs shall not furnish income enough for governmental needs, can and should be devised which, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, will conform to the Constitution.

This was his utterance before election, speaking to the American people.

In his inaugural address, however, President Taft made the following recommendation:

> Should it be impossible to do so (secure sufficient revenue) from import duties, new kinds of taxation must be adopted, and among these I recommend a graduated inheritance tax as correct in principle and as certain and easy of collection.

It was in accordance with this recommendation that the Ways and Means Committee reported an inheritance-tax law as part of the Payne tariff bill, and this was subsequently passed by the House and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

On June 16, 1909, President Taft transmitted a special message to Congress from which the following is an extract:

I recommend a graduated-inheritance tax as correct in principle and as certain and easy of collection. The House of Representatives has adopted the suggestion and has provided in the bill it passed for the collection of such a tax. In the Senate the action of its Finance Committee and the course of debate indicate that it may not agree to this provision, and it is now proposed to make up the deficit by the imposition of a general-income tax in form and substance of almost exactly the same character as that which, in the case of Pollock v. the Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429), was held by the Supreme Court to be a direct tax, and therefore not within the power of the General Government to impose unless apportioned among the States according to their population.

The decision in the Pollock case left power in the National Government to levy an excise tax which accomplished the same purpose as a corporation income tax, but is free from certain objections urged to the proposed income-tax measure. I therefore recommend an amendment to the tariff bill imposing upon all corporations and joint-stock companies for profit, except national banks (otherwise taxed), savings banks, and building and loan associations, an excise tax measured by 2 per cent on the net income of such corporations. This is an excise tax upon the privilege of doing business as an artificial entity and of freedom from a general partnership liability enjoyed by those who own stock.

As a result of this special message the present corporation-tax law was enacted, which provides for a tax rate of 1 per cent levied on the net income of certain corporations, as follows:

An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, provided that certain corporations, joint-stock companies, and insurance companies should be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to carrying on or doing business by such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by it from all sources during such year.

I desire and ask leave to insert here as a part of my remarks an extract from Kennan's work on Income Taxation, commencing on page 279 and ending on page 282 of said work:

Early in the history of the Payne tariff bill Senator BAILEY, of Texas, introduced an amendment which provided for a general income tax. This amendment followed very closely the income-tax law of 1894, except that it provided for a fixed rate of 3 per cent on all incomes in excess of $5,000, and contained special provisions for a corporation tax, an inheritance tax, and a tax on gifts, devises, and bequests.

At the same time Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa, presented an amendment proposing a graduated tax upon all incomes over $5,000 a year. The scale of rates proposed by him was as follows:

On incomes not exceeding $10,000, 2 per cent.
On incomes not exceeding $20,000, 2½ per cent.
On incomes not exceeding $40,000, 3 per cent.
On incomes not exceeding $60,000, 3½ per cent.
On incomes not exceeding $80,000, 4 per cent.
On incomes not exceeding $100,000, 5 per cent.
On incomes of more than $100,000, 6 per cent.

These two amendments were eventually consolidated, mainly in the form of the Bailey bill, and strenuous efforts were made to secure the adoption of the "Bailey-Cummins amendment" before proceeding to revise the tariff. It was urged that if there was a prospect of raising $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 by a tax on incomes much larger reductions could be made in the tariff schedules. The Republican leaders, however, took alarm at this plan as involving a menace to the whole protective system, and succeeded in postponing action on the income-tax amendments until the revision of the tariff should be completed and the amount of the resulting deficit definitely known.

The position taken by the administration forces of the Senate is shown by the following colloquy which occurred June 29, 1909, between Senator Clay, of Georgia, and Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island:

"Mr. CLAY. I want to ask the Senator a question. If we are to raise $50,000,000 per year by a tax on corporation dividends, does the Senator think that such a tax is a vicious assault upon the protective system; and, second, if this bill as it stands will produce enough revenue to support the Government and we adopt the corporation tax raising $50,000,000, does not the Senator think we ought to take up some of the other schedules and reduce the duty in proportion to the amount that we raise by the corporation tax?

"Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Georgia want an answer?

"Mr. CLAY. I would not have asked the question if I did not.

"Mr. ALDRICH. I shall vote for the corporation tax as a means to defeat the income tax.

"Mr. CLAY. I think that is an honest statement.

"Mr. ALDRICH. I will be perfectly frank with the Senator in that respect. I shall vote for it for another reason. The statement which I made shows a deficit for this year and for next year. This year I estimated $69,000,000. It will be $60,000,000. And next year I estimate a deficit of $45,000,000. I am willing that that deficit shall be taken care of by a corporation tax. That corporation tax, however, at the end of two years, if my estimate should be correct, should be reduced to a nominal amount or repealed. It can be reduced to a nominal amount, and the feature of the corporation tax that commends it to many Senators and a great many other people is that the corporation tax, if it is adopted, will certainly be very largely reduced, if not repealed at the end of two years.

"So I am willing to accept a proposition of this kind for the purpose of avoiding what to my mind is a great evil and the imposition of a tax in time of peace when there is no emergency, a tax which is sure in the end to destroy the protective system."

So you will understand that the corporation-tax law was brought forward and enacted into law primarily for the purpose of defeating a general income tax, and President Taft readily assented to this proposition, and then only to be abandoned after a brief while, the main purpose being to do nothing that would interfere with high tariff laws.

A different view as to the probable permanency of the law was entertained by Senator Flint of California, who said:

"If the amendment is adopted by Congress it will remain permanently on the statute books until such time as the people of this country, through their legislatures, shall ratify the constitutional amendment, and then there will be added to it an income tax."

Senator ROOT of New York, in his speech advocating the passage of the corporation-tax amendment, expressed himself as follows:

"Gentlemen may say I am for the corporation tax to beat the income tax. I care not. I am for the corporation tax because I think it is better policy, better patriotism, higher wisdom than the general income tax at this time and under these circumstances. I wish to beat the income-tax provision because I think it is unwise, and I wish to pass the corporation-tax provision because I think it is wise."

These extracts will, perhaps, suffice to show that the corporation tax was not proposed and passed as an important and desirable addition to our fiscal system; nor was any attempt made to justify it from an economic or scientific standpoint. The avowed purpose of its advocates was to defeat the general income tax and incidentally to raise money to meet a temporary deficiency. This was fully understood by the Democrats, but they were in a position where they could not oppose the bill without seeming to favor the corporations and to be acting in opposition to an income-tax law. When the vote was taken on Senator BAILEY'S motion to substitute the income-tax amendment for the corporation-tax law there were 28 yeas and 47 nays, 17 not voting. There were only 5 Republicans, namely, Senators BORAH, BRISTOW, CLAPP, CUMMINS, and LA FOLLETTE, who voted for the income tax and no Democrats who voted against it.

Review of Reviews (vol. 40, p. 136, Aug. 1, 1910), referring to the corporation-tax law, says:

Its coming into being is one of the most remarkable of recent legislative events. It was not discussed during the campaign; it was not mentioned in President Taft's inaugural; it was not proposed in the compact and deliberate program laid down by the President in his message at the opening of the special session, nor was it brought forward as any part of the pending revenue measure by any Member of Congress.

I desire to insert here another quotation, taken from LA FOLLETTE, is my recollection:

During the campaign the President had said that "in my judgment an amendment to the Constitution for an income tax is not necessary. I believe that an income tax * * * can and should be devised which, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, will conform to the Constitution." An amendment to the tariff bill providing for such an income tax was prepared and approved by the best constitutional lawyers in both parties. In a recent authorized interview the President said:

"There was strong pressure from the Democrats and some of the Republicans, including all of the 'insurgents,' for the revival of the old income tax on the principle that the personnel of the Supreme Court had been changed since its decision that the act of 1894 was unconstitutional. * * * I have always been in favor of an income-tax-laying power, because it may some time be needed to save the Nation, but I did not think this the proper way to secure it, having a due regard for the prestige of the Supreme Court. * * * I did not wish to see it placed in the position of reversing itself as long as there was another way of reaching the desired end by a constitutional amendment." Senator Aldrich objected to the income tax and joined with the President in substituting for it the corporation tax. The President reversed himself on the income tax.

The constitutional amendment submitted is as follows:

ART. XVI. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.

And it has been ratified by 30 States.

When the income-tax amendment was first presented to the New York Legislature, ratification by the assembly was defeated by a close vote, and one of the explanations offered against its adoption was:

The reason the amendment failed was because a majority of the assemblymen were unwilling to have the great wealth of the State of New York taxed for the benefit of the South and West, whose Congressmen are in the majority and whose people would bear but little of the burden.

In the State of Virginia where ratification failed in the house, as charged by reason of the opposition of the speaker, it was claimed by the speaker that the proposed amendment—is a voluntary invitation to the Federal Government to invade and occupy the innermost citadel of what remains of the reserved rights of the States.

In the State of Louisiana the income-tax amendment has not been ratified, though the lower house on July 2, 1910, by a vote of 77 to 31 voted for ratification. Gov. Sanders opposed the amendment, and it failed to pass the senate, and in his race before the people for United States Senator that fact was used against him and he was defeated.

High protective laws are doomed, and the growth of sentiment in favor of income taxation will compel the enactment of income-tax laws. It is said that no foreign country which has adopted an income tax within the past 25 years has seen fit to abandon it. It was the failure of President Taft to make good his pledges for tariff reduction, his failure to use his influence in behalf of an honest tariff revision, his surrender to the high-tariff interests, and his indorsement of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill that helped to weaken him before the country and to bring defeat to his party in 1910.

It has very recently been charged in the opposition Republican press that an income-tax measure would have been written into the tariff of 1909 but for the President's combination with the Aldrich-Cannon forces to prevent it, as a result of which the income tax was kept out of the law and the corporation tax substituted, the Democrats with some insurgents trying to put an income-tax amendment onto the bill, as shown earlier in my remarks, and thereby prevented a general income-tax measure being put up again to the Supreme Court, for the reasons heretofore stated.

The income tax, which had been held constitutional by the Supreme Court for a hundred years, by a sudden change of vote by one judge was held unconstitutional, nullified, and set at naught though it had passed by a nearly unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress, and had been approved by the President and voiced the will of the people. The decision was by a divided court of five to four. This decision, brought about by the vote of one judge changing his opinion, the four dissenting judges have denounced it in vigorous language, excerpts from which I will here insert.

Mr. Justice Harlan said:

This decision may well excite the gravest apprehension—it may provoke a contest in this country from which the American people would have been spared if the court had not overturned its former adjudications and had adhered to the principles of taxation under which our Government has always been administered. It can not be regarded otherwise than as a disaster to the country.

And, concluding, says:

If the decision of the majority had stricken down all the income-tax sections, either because of unauthorized exemptions or because of defects that could have been remedied by subsequent legislation, the result would not have been one to cause anxiety or regret; for, in such a case, Congress could have enacted a new statute that would not have been liable to constitutional objections. But the serious aspect of the present decision is that by a new interpretation of the Constitution it so ties the hands of the legislative branch of the Government that without an amendment of that instrument, or unless this court at some future time should return to the old theory of the Constitution, Congress can not subject to taxation—however great the needs or pressing the necessities of the Government—either the invested personal property of the country, bonds, stocks, and investments of all kinds, or the income arising from the renting of real estate, or from the yield of personal property, except by the grossly unequal and unjust rule of apportionment among the States. Thus, undue and disproportioned burdens are placed upon the many, while the few, safely intrenched behind the rule of apportionment among the States on the basis of numbers, are permitted to evade their share of responsibility for the support of the Government ordained for the protection of the rights of all.

I can not assent to an interpretation of the Constitution that impairs and cripples the just powers of the National Government in the essential matter of taxation and at the same time discriminates against the greater part of the people of our country.

The practical effect of the decision to-day is to give to certain kinds of property a position of favoritism and advantage inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our social organization, and to invest them with power and influence that may be perilous to that portion of the American people upon whom rests the larger part of the burdens of the Government, and who ought not to be subjected to the dominion of aggregated wealth any more than the property of the country should be at the mercy of the lawless.

Mr. Justice Brown concluded his dissenting opinion in the following language:

It is difficult to overestimate the importance of these cases. I certainly can not overstate the regret I feel at the disposition made of them by the court. It is never a light thing to set aside the deliberate will of the legislature, and in my opinion it should never be done except upon the clearest proof of its conflict with the fundamental law. Respect for the Constitution will not be inspired by a narrow and technical construction which shall limit or impair the necessary powers of Congress. Did the reversal of these cases involve merely the striking down of the inequitable features of this law, or even the whole law, for its want of uniformity, the consequences would be less serious; but as it implies a declaration that every income tax must be laid according to the rule of apportionment, the decision involves nothing less than a surrender of the taxing power to the moneyed class. By resuscitating an argument that was exploded in the Hylton case, and has lain practically dormant for a hundred years, it is made to do duty in nullifying, not this law alone, but every similar law that is not based upon an impossible theory of apportionment. Even the specter of socialism is conjured up to frighten Congress from laying taxes upon the people in proportion to their ability to pay them. It is certainly a strange commentary upon the Constitution of the United States and upon a democratic government that Congress has no power to lay a tax which is one of the main sources of revenue of nearly every civilized state. It is a confession of feebleness in which I find myself wholly unable to join.

While I have no doubt that Congress will find some means of surmounting the present crisis, my fear is that in some moment of national peril this decision will rise up to frustrate its will and paralyze its arm. I hope it may not prove the first step toward the submergence of the liberties of the people in a sordid despotism of wealth.

As I can not escape the conviction that the decision of the court in this great case is fraught with immeasurable danger to the future of the country and that it approaches the proportions of a national calamity, I feel it a duty to enter my protest against it.

Mr. Justice Jackson, in dissenting, concludes as follows:

The practical operation of the decision is not only to disregard the great principles of equality in taxation, but the further principle that in the imposition of taxes for the benefit of the Government the burdens thereof should be imposed upon those having most ability to bear them. This decision, in effect, works out a directly opposite result in relieving the citizens having the greater ability, while the burdens of taxation are made to fall most heavily and oppressively upon those having the least ability. It lightens the burden upon the larger number in some States subject to the tax and places it most unequally and disproportionately on the smaller number in other States. Considered in all its bearings, this decision is, in my judgment, the most disastrous blow ever struck at the constitutional power of Congress. It strikes down an important portion of the most vital and essential power of the Government in practically excluding any recourse to incomes from real and personal estate for the purpose of raising needed revenue to meet the Government's wants and necessities under any circumstances.

Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice of the United States, dissenting, says of the majority opinion:

The injustice of the conclusion points to the error of adopting it. It takes invested wealth and reads it into the Constitution as a favored and protected class of property, which can not be taxed without apportionment, whilst it leaves the occupation of the minister, the doctor, the professor, the lawyer, the inventor, the author, the merchant, the mechanic, and all other forms of industry upon which the prosperity of the people must depend, subject to taxation without that condition. A rule which works out this result, which, it seems to me, stultifies the Constitution by making it an instrument of most grievous wrong, should not be adopted, especially when, in order to do so, the decisions of this court, the opinions of the law writers and publicists, tradition, practice, and the settled policy of the Government must be overthrown.

And concluding his able dissenting opinion says:

It is, I submit, greatly to be deplored that, after more than 100 years of our national existence, after the Government has withstood the strain of foreign wars and the dread ordeal of civil strife, and its people have become united and powerful, this court should consider itself compelled to go back to a long repudiated and rejected theory of the Constitution, by which the Government is deprived of an inherent attribute of its being, a necessary power of taxation.

The patriotic utterances of the dissenting judges in the income-tax decision will live in the minds and hearts of the American people, and in my judgment at an early date their opinions will be regarded as the law and the majority opinion will be discarded and set aside as the mistaken judgment of this high court.

Judge Walter Clark, chief justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, one of the ablest judges of the South and of the country, in an address to the law department of the University of Pennsylvania, April 27, 1906, in discussing the action of the Supreme Court in declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional, says:

Such power does not exist in any other country and never has. It is therefore not essential to our security. It is not conferred by the Constitution; but, on the contrary, the convention, as we have seen, after the fullest debate, four times, on four several days, refused by a decisive vote to confer such power. The judges not only have never exercised such power in England, where there is no written constitution, but they do not exercise it in France, Germany, Austria, Denmark, or in any other country which, like them, has a written constitution.

A more complete denial of popular control of this Government could not have been conceived than the placing of such unreviewable power in the hands of men not elected by the people and holding office for life. The legal-tender act, the financial policy of the Government, was invalidated by one court and then validated by another, after a change in its personnel. Then the income tax, which had been held constitutional by the court for a hundred years, was again so held, and then by a sudden change of vote by one judge it was held unconstitutional, nullified, and set at naught, though it had passed by a nearly unanimous vote both Houses of Congress, containing many lawyers who were the equals, if not the superiors, of the vacillating judge, and had been approved by the President and voiced the will of the people. This was all negatived (without any warrant in the Constitution for the court to set aside an act of Congress) by the vote of one judge; and thus $100,000,000 and more of annual taxation was transferred from those most able to bear it and placed upon the backs of those who already carried more than their fair share of the burdens of government. Under an untrue assumption of authority given by 39 dead men one man nullified the action of Congress and the President and the will of 75,000,000 of living people, and in the 13 years since has taxed the property and labor of the country, by his sole vote, $1,300,000,000, which Congress, in compliance with the public will and relying on previous decisions of the court, had decreed should be paid out of the excessive incomes of the rich.

In England one-third of the revenue is derived from the superfluities of the very wealthy by the levy of a graduated income tax and a graduated inheritance tax, increasing the per cent with the size of the income. The same system is in force in all other civilized countries. In not one of them would the heriditary monarch venture to veto or declare null such a tax. In this country alone the people, speaking through their Congress and with the approval of their Executive, can not put in force a single measure of any nature whatever with assurance that it shall meet with the approval of the courts; and its failure to receive such approval is fatal, for, unlike the veto of the Executive, the unanimous vote of Congress (and the income tax came near receiving such vote) can not prevail against it. Of what avail shall it be if Congress shall conform to the popular demand and enact a "rate-regulation" bill and the President shall approve it if five lawyers, holding office for life and not elected by the people, shall see fit to destroy it, as they did the income-tax law? Is such a government a reasonable one, and can it be longer tolerated after 120 years of experience have demonstrated the capacity of the people for self-government? If five lawyers can negative the will of 100,000,000 of men, then the art of government is reduced to the selection of those five lawyers.

A power without limit, except in the shifting views of the court, lies in the construction placed upon the fourteenth amendment, which passed, as everyone knows, solely to prevent discrimination against the colored race, has been construed by the court to confer upon it jurisdiction to hold any provision of any statute whatever "not due process of law." This draws the whole body of the reserved rights of the States into the maelstrom of the Federal courts, subject only to such forbearance as the Federal Supreme Court of the day or in any particular case may see fit to exercise. The limits between State and Federal jurisdiction depend upon the views of five men at any given time, and we have a government of men and not a government of laws, prescribed beforehand.

At first the court generously exempted from its veto the police power of the several States. But since then it has proceeded to set aside an act of the Legislature of New York restricting excessive hours of labor, which act had been sustained by the highest court in that great State. Thus labor can obtain no benefit from the growing humanity of the age, expressed by the popular will in any State, if such statute does not meet the views of five elderly lawyers, selected by influences naturally antagonistic to the laboring classes and whose training and daily associations certainly can not incline them in favor of restrictions upon the power of the employer.

The vast political power now asserted and exercised by the court to set aside public policies, after their full determination by Congress, can not safely be left in the hands of any body of men without supervision or control by any other authority whatever. If the President errs, his mandate expires in four years, and his party as well as himself is accountable to the people at the ballot box for his stewardship. If Members of Congress err, they, too, must account to their constituents. But the Federal judiciary hold for life, and though popular sentiment should change the entire personnel of the other two great departments of government, a whole generation must pass away before the people could get control of the judiciary, which possesses an irresponsible and unrestricted veto upon the action of the other departments—irresponsible because impeachment has become impossible, and if it were possible it could not be invoked as to erroneous decisions unless corruption were shown.

The control of the policy of government is thus not in the hands of the people, but in the power of a small body of men not chosen by the people and holding for life. In many cases which might be mentioned, had the court been elective, men not biased in favor of colossal wealth would have filled more seats upon the bench, and if there had been such decision as in the Income Tax case, long ere this, under the tenure of a term of years, new incumbents would have been chosen, who, returning to the former line of decisions, would have upheld the right of Congress to control the financial policy of the Government in accordance with the will of the people of this day and age, and not according to the shifting views which the court has imputed to language used by the majority of the 55 men who met in Philadelphia in 1787.

It may be that this power in the courts, however illegally grasped originally, has been too long acquiesced in to be now questioned. If so, the only remedy which can be applied is to make the judges elective and for a term of years, for no people can permit its will to be denied and its destinies shaped by men it did not choose and over whose conduct it has no control, by reason of its having no power to change them and select other agents at the close of a fixed term.

As far back as 1820 Mr. Jefferson had discovered the "sapping and mining," as he termed it, of the life-tenure, appointive Federal judiciary, owing no gratitude to the people for their appointment and fearing no inconvenience from their conduct, however arbitrary, in the discharge of such office. In short, they possess the autocratic power of absolute irresponsibility. "Step by step, one goes very far," says the French proverb. This is true of the Federal judiciary. Compare their jurisdiction in 1801, when Marshall ascended the bench, and their jurisdiction in 1906. The Constitution has been remade and rewritten by the judicial glosses put upon it. Had it been understood in 1787 to mean what it is construed to mean to-day, it is safe to say not a single State would have ratified it.

As was said by a great lawyer lately deceased, Judge Seymour D. Thompson, in 1891 (25 Am. Law Review, 288): "If the proposition to make the Federal judiciary elective instead of appointive is once seriously discussed before the people, nothing can stay the growth of that sentiment, and it is almost certain that every session of the Federal Supreme Court will furnish material to stimulate that growth."

Great aggregations of wealth know their own interests, and it is very certain that there is no reform and no constitutional amendment that they will oppose more bitterly than this. What, then, is the interest of all others in regard to it?

For my part, I believe in popular government. The remedy for the halting, halfway popular government which we have is more power to the people. When some one observed to Mr. Gladstone that the "people are not always right," he replied, "No; but they are rarely wrong." When they are wrong their intelligence and their interests combine to make them correct the wrong. But when rulers, whether kings or life judges, or great corporations, commit an error against the interests of the masses, there is no such certainty of correction.

The time may not be ripe when the election of supreme Federal judges should be written in the Federal Constitution, but the time has come when the Constitution of the United States should be so amended as to forbid the appointment of Federal judges for life and a limitation be put upon their tenure of office; and at least the judges of the inferior or district Federal courts should be either elected or appointed for a limited term of years. If the public is in that condition of mind in which it is ready to strike down life tenure in office, that condition is due in a large measure to appointments of men whose leanings are toward corporate wealth rather than the public will, and to the arbitrary abuse of power by Federal judges.

Is it any wonder that there is a growing prejudice among the masses of the people against life tenure in office and against Federal courts, when by them the laws of the States and of the Nation are so readily set aside and declared null and void, ofttimes at the instance of great corporate interests that in their greed for gain forget the public welfare and bid defiance to the popular will? The unrest in the country is the outgrowth of accumulated wrongs unredressed. A change is demanded. A political revolution is abroad in the land. The conscience of the Nation has been quickened. A mighty protest against further domination by special interests is heard in all sections of the country. The rule of privilege is doomed. The day of the reactionary is drawing to a close, and the appeal for progressive and constructive legislation is finding a response in the halls of legislation. The cry of the masses for relief against the burdens of taxation, unequally distributed, is being heard and heeded by that party which alone can and will restore as an actual fact a government of the people, for the people, by the people.

The Republic must be preserved by Democratic effort or socialism, the logical result of Republican misrule, will try its hand and new and untried doctrines and mere experiments in government be thrust to the front, and individual responsibility and self-reliance will give place to communism with all its attendant confusion. But if Democratic effort fail, the dawn of socialism will not be so forbidding as the further rule of selfish privilege. Corporate domination must end or Government ownership of all public utilities will come. Before we go from one extreme to the other let us restore to power that party whose great history gives evidence and confidence to the country that in the triumph of Democratic principles lies the safety of the Republic.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from New York to use some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the gentleman from Alabama going to use the balance of this hour he has entered upon?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no one on the floor now that cares to go on, and I prefer that the gentleman from New York should use some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. I have some difficulty in keeping my orators on the floor, but I will yield one hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, this is not a political question, or, at least, it is not a partisan question. I apprehend that every man will find his alignment in this matter determined very much by his early surroundings, his natural sympathies, and his early education. I am going to discuss this question for the time that has been allotted to me freely, frankly, as I see it, without any reference to what anybody else thinks or without reference to what criticism it may bring to me.

Now, as I said, the alignments in this case will rest very largely on our early surroundings. I remember when a boy my father and myself used to saw logs in the timber, and when we got ready to go home at night we put the tools in a sack and strung them on a handspike and carried them home. I always noticed that my good old father gave me the long end of the handspike, and I honor to this day his memory for that thing. There are people in this world who, when they find that one man is a little bit weaker than another, insist on giving him the short end of the handspike and make him carry the heavier part of the load. I am not in favor of that policy.

Taxes are the involuntary contribution made by the citizens to their government for the protection of their persons and their property. All agree that these contributions should be in proportion to the protection received, and every humane man will concede that it ought to bear some relation to the ability to contribute. A rich man ought to contribute more than a poor man, because he has more property to protect and is better able to contribute.

Keeping these propositions clearly in mind, let us analyze our system of national taxation.

There are two systems of taxation in general use in this country and in foreign countries. One is known as direct taxation, in which men are taxed either in proportion to the property they own or the income they receive; the other, an indirect or consumption tax. When our forefathers were shaping our Constitution they chose, in a general way, the indirect method of taxation for the Federal Government and gave to the States the direct method. This was done at the time largely on account of the fact that indirect taxes can be collected without knowledge by the donor of the amount that he is paying, and hence it can be collected usually without friction, while by the direct method of taxation the taxpayer knows the amount and usually pays it all at a time, and therefore feels its burden. And this method is apt to create friction and irritation. As the Federal Government had not then been formed, and as it was feared the people would not have the same loyalty toward the new Federal Government that they had toward their State government, it was deliberately designed that this indirect method of taxation should be largely preserved for the Nation. It was thought that the people would not feel heavily the burden of this taxation. So wisely did they choose and so successfully has this propaganda been taught that many have now been led to believe that this method of taxation enriches instead of impoverishes. It may as a protection but never as a revenue measure.

I might as well say here, for the benefit of my Democratic friends, that there is no possible application of their theory of a tariff for revenue only which can relieve itself from the criticism that it is nothing in the world but a burden, without any benefit in return for it. My Republican friends on this side, while admitting, I think, as freely as I do the burden of this taxation, at the same time, by their very ingenious and wise method of making it a protection to the man who pays it, make it, in a sense, an equation that is at least tolerable.

It is true that under the Constitution the Federal Government has power to levy direct taxes, provided they are distributed among the States in proportion to population. But the inevitable inequalities resulting from such a plan of taxation are so gross and flagrant as to absolutely debar any use whatever of that method. So practically the only taxing power the Federal Government has is that allowing it to collect duties, imposts, and excises. Practically all the money collected by the Government is from two sources—custom duties and internal revenue. These taxes are paid by the individual, not in proportion to his property nor in proportion to his ability to pay them, but, barring negligible quantities and a few exceptional instances, they are paid in direct proportion to the amount consumed by the taxpayer and those dependent upon him. The poor man pays as much as the rich man if he uses as many of the taxed goods, and he pays more if he uses more. I know there are those who claim the consumer does not pay the tax, and there are a few instances in which that is true, but, on the whole and as a general rule, the man who consumes the article pays the tax, and there is not a writer on political economy who does not now both recognize and announce this rule. It is easily demonstrable both as to our income and our duty tax. Take, for instance, the internal revenue on cigars.

The man who makes the cigars, after computing the cost of material and labor, adds the Federal revenue tax and then sells them to the wholesaler at enough to equal these items and a reasonable profit to himself. It is true he pays the tax in the first instance, but when he sells them to the wholesaler he gets it back. It is true, then, that at that time the wholesaler pays it, but when he sells them to the retailer he gets his money back, and then the retailer has paid it. The retailer then sells them to the consumer, and he gets his money back, so the retailer has not paid it.; it is passed on to the consumer. When he smokes the cigar he has nobody to get the tax back from, and he is the man who has finally paid the tax.

And this is true of every article upon which an internal-revenue tax is levied. This is equally true of customs duties.

We have just been discussing the sugar schedule on which there is a tariff duty of $1.95 outside of that coming from Cuba. When the importer brings this sugar into this country he has to pay this tax, and for the time being it may be said that he has paid it, but when he sells it to the wholesaler he includes this item in the price and gets it back, so, then, he hasn't paid the tax, but the wholesaler has. The wholesaler then sells it to the retailer, including this item in the price. Then the wholesaler gets back the tax, and the retailer has paid it. The retailer then sells it to the consumer, and he includes this tax in the price. Then he gets back the taxes he has paid when the consumer has paid him. But the consumer and his family eats up the sugar and they have got no one from whom they can get back the tax they have paid. And, therefore, the ultimate consumer is the one who has actually paid the tax.

Mr. COX of Ohio. The gentleman should direct his remarks to the other side of the House.

Mr. PROUTY. No; my good friends on the Democratic side of the House, some of them, need it just as badly as they do on the other side. When you levy a tax based upon revenue, you are collecting in the same proportion from the rich and the poor as do these gentlemen on the Republican side, so far as that is concerned.

Take, again, the imported cloth in a suit of clothes. The importer brings it in and pays the duty or tax; he sells it to the wholesale merchant and includes in the price the duty. He has then got back the tax and has not paid it. He is out nothing on account of the tax. The wholesaler sells it to the merchant tailor, and in the sale includes the duty. He has got the tax back and is therefore out nothing, but the merchant tailor has paid it. The merchant tailor makes a suit of clothes, and in the price of the suit he figures in the cost of the cloth, the duty included. So, he has got back his money and has not paid the tax. The fellow that has bought the suit of clothes has paid it, and as he wears out the clothes he has no one from whom he can be reimbursed, and he therefore pays the tax.

And this is true of pepper and every other item upon which a tariff is levied, whether for revenue or protection, barring, of course, a few negligible quantities and phenomenal cases.

From this it will be seen that so far as the Federal Government is concerned its vast revenues are gathered in from the people who finally consume the articles upon which an internal or tariff duty is levied. And that, too, without the slightest reference to the ability to pay or to the protection of the property owned.

I assert that on the whole the moderately poor of the country pay more per capita for the support and defense of this Government than do the opulent rich. Why? The opulent rich seldom have big families. The moderately poor usually raise large families and therefore are the larger consumers. I assert that this method of taxation is grossly unfair and unjust, and I am quite surprised that my Democratic friends desire to perpetuate this system, when its sole and only purpose, according to their doctrine, is the collecting of revenue. It is the most unjust, unfair, and inequitable system that has ever been devised by mortal man. It was apparently designed to collect the expenses of the Government off of the poor without letting them know it.

These men own in the aggregate about $3,500,000,000 of property, and it is said that they control about $35,000,000,000. The report of the Bureau of Commerce and Labor of the same date showed that the approximate wealth of the United States was $107,000,000,000, so these 51 people own and control practically one-third of the entire wealth of the United States. Now, I will venture the statement that these men, with their vast wealth, do not pay the Federal Government for its support and for its defense of their persons and vast properties as much as an equal number of section hands on the Pennsylvania Railroad, who are heads of families.

Take the first man on the list—John D. Rockefeller, at that time reputed to be worth $600,000,000, with a reputed income of $60,000,000 a year.

I have living near me at home a section man that has eight children with an actual income of $504 a year. Now, I will wager everything I have that this section man pays more for the support of the Federal Government than does John D. Rockefeller.

Now, let us analyze for a minute. Where do our taxes come from to support the Federal Government? From internal revenue and tariff duties.

Now, what are the items from which we collect internal-revenue duties principally? Spirits, tobacco, and oleomargarine.

Now, my friend, Rockefeller does not smoke, he does not chew, he does not drink, he does not take snuff, and he does not eat oleomargarine, and therefore he does not pay a cent to the Federal Government on its internal-revenue tax. I am sorry to say that my section hand friend uses a small amount of all of those items and therefore pays the tax on them.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know about that. What is the gentleman's authority for his statement? Oleomargarine is one of the most wholesome and nutritious food products which is being manufactured.

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to find somebody on that side of the House who is ready to stand up here and defend the Oleomargarine Trust. I am not.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman will find an overwhelming majority on this side who are ready to defend untaxed oleomargarine——

Mr. PROUTY. I have already learned, to my sorrow, that I may expect anything from the stupendous majority of that side of the House.

Mr. BURLESON. Which will be largely supplemented by votes on your side of the Chamber.

Mr. PROUTY. That may be prediction only. I have seen men on that side make predictions that failed to come true.

Mr. BURLESON. This particular one will be justified, however, and that, too, in the near future.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Just as soon as I finish the sentence I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOWMAN. That is one reason why he is there.

Mr. PROUTY. There are fellows who do not do any of those things who are just as poor.

Mr. BOWMAN. Not many that I know of.

Mr. PROUTY. You live in a mighty prosperous country, if that is true.

Mr. BOWMAN. I surely do.

Mr. PROUTY. I live in a country where very few men partake of one of the articles which I have named.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The statistics show that the gentleman's State has a larger per capita wealth than any other State in the Union.

Mr. PROUTY. I agree with you on that, sir, and yet the same statistics, I am sorry to say, show that the average income of the people of my State is only a little over $600. And yet I am prepared to say that the people of my State, with an average income of $600 a year, pay more per capita than does John D. Rockefeller for the support of this great Government that lends its entire power in the support of his vast property. The Armies and Navies of the United States are always held in readiness to defend his holdings in every quarter of the globe.

Now, I am going to take up the other proposition.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman how he figures that the people of his State pay so much more than the average of the Federal revenue tax?

Mr. PROUTY. I have not said that. I said that they paid more on an average than John D. Rockefeller did. That is all I said. I am going to stand on that proposition until somebody knocks me down with a hard fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly, but do not take too much of my time.

Mr. POWERS. Do you not favor the tax on whisky, and tobacco, and oleomargarine, and is not the tax on those articles levied, for one reason, to discourage their use because of the fact that they are detrimental to morals and health?

Mr. PROUTY. I am not going to turn from this discussion in order to deliver a temperance lecture, although I can. I am discussing a revenue policy, pure and simple, and not temperance.

Now, take the articles upon which tariff duties are levied. There is sugar. I venture the assertion that my section hand and his family use 10 pounds of sugar to 1 used by the dyspeptic Rockefeller and his good wife, and therefore he pays 10 times as much tax to the Federal Government. And this is true of pepper and every other article of food on the tax lists, and this is largely true of wearing apparel.

My section man and his good wife and eight boys and girls wear out more boots and shoes, more hats, more pants, more coats, more dresses, more neckties, more collars than does my peripatetic friend J. D. and his good wife. If the reports in the newspapers are to be credited, J. D. has most of his clothes made for himself and his wife in Paris, which he brings in duty free; and I saw by the papers that the last time he was in Paris he bought wigs enough to last him the rest of his life. [Laughter.]

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in making the comparison of the section hand with John D. Rockefeller, wherein he makes the section man pay more for the support of the Government than John D. Rockefeller—I want to know if he means to say that the difference is brought about because the section man that he speaks of chews and drinks? [Laughter.]

Mr. PROUTY. Everything that he consumes and eats and drinks on which there is a duty or revenue tax.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, I ask if it is not a fact that the section man pays more because of what he eats and wears to the General Government for its support than John D. Rockefeller?

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, I have just covered that point. If the gentleman does not understand it I can not afford to take time to repeat it.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; but you wound up with his chewing and smoking in making the distinction. I want to separate them. [Laughter.]

Mr. PROUTY. Well, take your time and separate them. Do not take that out of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Now, if the gentleman will vote as he talks, he will be all right. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. The gentleman should not undertake to make a speech in my time.

So I repeat the statement that I made a few minutes ago, that J. D. Rockefeller does not pay to the Federal Government for his own protection, or the protection of his vast properties, as much as does this poor section man with his big family. John D. Rockefeller does not pay as much out of his income of $60,000,000 as does this man out of his income of $504.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. Of course the gentleman from Iowa does not include the corporate tax paid under the last Republican law?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; I do.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman would not contend that the scheme——

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, I have not time to let the gentleman make an argument. The gentleman can get as much time for himself as I have.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, the gentleman need not be uneasy about his position——

Mr. PROUTY. I am not. Take for example the case of John D. Rockefeller. Practically every bit of money that he gets—all his income—has been tithed first for the revenue tax on the corporate income before it reaches him. In other words, take the Standard Oil Co.; before he gets his dividends the company has been compelled to pay a revenue tax. Where did that company get the money with which to pay not only his dividends but the tax? I answer, from the people that used his coal oil. [Applause.]

Mr. JACKSON. Yes; but the gentleman surely——

Mr. PROUTY. Pardon me, Mr. Jackson. I can not afford to stop in order that you may make an argument, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman will not let me ask him a question. The gentleman should be fair enough to admit that Mr. Rockefeller's revenues are diminished by the amount of the tax given to the Federal Government?

Mr. PROUTY. No. His amount is not diminished by the tax. Any man who has been watching this matter can see easily that if it is from Standard Oil enough is collected from the people that use oil to cover expense, tax, and dividends. Having as they do a practical monopoly, they do not allow the tax to interfere with dividends. They just raise the price to the consumer enough to equal the tax. If the dividends are from railroad stocks or other public-service corporations it is just as true. The public pays the fares that cover the tax to the Government and the dividend to Rockefeller. If there was no tax the fares could be less. The public therefore pays the corporation tax—not Rockefeller.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this bill provide that an individual drawing dividends from a corporation which pays the corporation tax shall be exempted from the tax provided to be collected under the bill?

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, if the gentleman has followed me correctly, he will have noticed that I am not either criticizing or championing this bill. I am discussing the principles upon which we should base an income tax and the reasons why it should be done.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking you whether the bill itself so provides.

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, I have not stopped to consider that.

Mr. MADDEN. Then you have not read the bill?

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, yes; I have. But it would take me half an hour to go over the authorities and decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to give you a fair discussion on that; and I have not the time for that.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the bill now under discussion say this——

Mr. PROUTY. No; I have answered the gentleman's question. I can not stop for a debate. What I said was this——

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. PROUTY. No; I can not stop, Mr. JACKSON. I know you can never stop asking questions; otherwise I would yield. [Laughter.]

Now, what I was trying to say is this: That we ought to have a system that would enable the Congress to pass a law that would distribute the burdens of taxation with some reference and some relation to the amount of property that a man has, or at least the amount of protection he has received from the Government, and, according to my theory, in accordance with his ability to bear the burdens of the Federal Government. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Now, you are getting down to bedrock.

Mr. PROUTY. Now, when our forefathers started on this system it was not a bad one. Our people were none of them very poor and none of them were very rich. But with the advancement of our civilization, with the vast accumulations of property, with the enormous incomes that some have, with the corresponding poverty brought to others, the present system is made practically intolerable, whether you found it upon the basis of a protective tariff or upon the basis of a tariff for revenue only. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCALL stated on the floor of the House the other day that the per capita tax for the Federal Government was about $7. That is about correct. This makes my section hand pay $70 per year as taxes for the support of the Federal Government. My friend J. D. possibly pays $14, but I seriously doubt that. If we had an income tax of 1 per cent on incomes above $5,000, J. D. would pay $599,950, which I submit is not out of proportion to the protection received for his vast properties. But not a dollar of this comes out of his necessities or even luxuries. But when you take $70 out of the meager income of the poor man, with his large family, you take it out of the necessities of life. It means privation and want. It means children poorly fed and thinly clad. It means children going to school with holes in their shoes, holes in their stockings and in their pants fore and aft. It means the taking of the children out of school at tender years and crowding them into the factory to help splice out the family living. It means sick children and no doctor. It means that the wan, gaunt specter of dread and want accompanies the holy stork. It means real pinching, poverty, and distress.

Such a system as that is intolerable and indefensible as a just system of collecting a revenue. It violates every principle of equity and equality. It puts the burdens upon those least able to bear them and practically relieves those who are best able to carry them. And I am simply shocked at the statements so frequently made on that side of the Chamber that they are going to convert this system of tariff duties into a pure revenue measure. I, for one, am prepared to say that when this system is no longer needed to protect American labor against competition from the cheap labor of Europe and Asia, when it is no longer needed to protect American industries from the ruinous competition of the Old World, when it is no longer needed to protect American manhood and womanhood and American standard of living, when it is no longer needed to prevent American labor from becoming "Japanesed" or "Chinesed," I am prepared to abolish it and substitute a system that will approximate justice—one that will levy burdens with some reference, at least, to the benefits received and the ability to pay.

Now, what is the system that will approximate these conditions? In my opinion a well graduated income tax levied on the excess above a fair living income. Such a tax would be just.

First. Because it only requires the payment of a small per cent of that portion of the income above that which is fairly necessary for the support of oneself and family.

Second. The effect of such a tax is to levy it upon every man substantially in proportion to the amount of his productive property.

Third. It places the burden of taxation upon the shoulders of those best able to bear them.

No one can feel seriously the burden of taxation when he is only required to pay into the Federal Treasury a small per cent of the amount of his income above a fair living price. Under our system now, the poor man has to take from the necessities of life to pay his share to the support of the Federal Government. Under the income tax suggested, no man would have to pay any tax until his necessities were fairly provided for. If I have an income of $10,000 a year, and myself and family can live comfortably and respectably on $5,000 a year, what possible harm can it do me or my family to pay a part of that $5,000 to the support of the Government that furnishes me and my property protection?

How different would be the burden imposed upon John D. Rockefeller if he had to pay 1 per cent on $60,000,000, which would be $600,000, to that of the section man who now pays out $70 out of his $504. John D. Rockefeller would still have left to live on during the whole year the sum of $59,400,000, while the section hand would only have $434 with which to feed, clothe, educate, and care for his family of 10. I repeat that no man can be oppressed with a fair income tax. If he does not make $5,000 a year he can not be compelled to pay anything. If Providence and his country are so good to him as to enable him to make more, it can not possibly be a burden to him to pay part of it in support of his Government.

But this brings us to the legal question. Some believe that under the Constitution and the decisions of our Supreme Court that Congress has no power to pass a revenue measure like the one now under consideration, and that the only way that this matter can be reached is by an amendment to the Federal Constitution, expressly conferring that authority on Congress. There are others, however, who believe there is room under the Constitution, as interpreted by our Supreme Court, to allow Congress to levy a tax of this character, and I understand our distinguished President to be one of that number. In his letter of acceptance of July 28, 1908, he said:

> The Democratic platform demands two constitutional amendments, one providing for an income tax and the other for the election of Senators by the people. In my judgment an amendment to the Constitution for an income tax is not necessary. I believe that an income tax, when the protective system of customs and the internal-revenue tax shall not furnish income enough for governmental need, can and should be devised which, under the decision of the Supreme Court, will conform to the Constitution.

In the case of Pollock against The Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., decided in the One hundred and fifty-seventh United States, page 429, the Supreme Court of the United States held the income tax of 1904 invalid and unconstitutional, because, as they construed it, it levied a direct tax on the rents or income of real estate, and because it levied a tax upon the income derived from municipal bonds. At that hearing the court was equally divided, four and four, upon the question as to whether Congress could levy an income tax derived from other sources.

Subsequently attorneys for the appellants filed a motion for a rehearing in that case for the final determination of the unsettled questions. And the Government, through the Attorney General, Mr. Olney, entered an appearance and asked that the whole case be reopened and reargued, not only upon the points undecided, but upon the whole question, which petition for a rehearing was granted on the part of the Supreme Court.

In the meantime the vacancy in the court had been filled by the recovery of Justice Jackson, making the full bench of nine members present. As the court had stood four to four in the first decision, it was generally supposed that Justice Jackson would be the controlling factor in the decision. And while in the final case he voted with Harlan, White, and Brown to support the constitutionality of the tax, one of the judges that had formerly voted with them turned over and voted with Chief Justice Fuller, thus making the court stand five for the unconstitutionality and four for the constitutionality of the act.

The opinions in this case appear in One hundred and fifty-eighth United States Reports, beginning on page 601 and ending on page 715. These pages, including, as they do, the briefs of counsel, the opinion of Chief Justice Fuller, and the dissenting opinions of Harlan, White, Brown, and Jackson, constitute, in my opinion, a record of the greatest legal battle that was ever fought in American jurisprudence. It was a battle of legal giants.

In that struggle, as he always did, Justice Harlan put upon the Constitution such a construction as he believed would protect the rights of the masses of people against the force and advantage of accumulated wealth. On page 684–685 he says:

> But the court takes care to say that there is no question as to the validity of any part of the Wilson Act, except those sections providing for a tax on incomes. Thus something is saved for the support and maintenance of the Government. It nevertheless results that those parts of the Wilson Act that survive the new theory of the Constitution evolved by these cases are those imposing burdens on the great body of the American people who derive no rents from real estate and who are not so fortunate as to own invested personal property, such as the bonds or stocks of corporations that hold within their control almost the entire business of the country.

Such a result is one to be deeply deplored. It can not be regarded otherwise than as a disaster to the country. The decree now passed dislocates—principally, for reasons of an economical nature—a sovereign power expressly granted to the General Government and long recognized and fully established by judicial decisions and legislative actions. It so interprets constitutional provisions originally designed to protect the slave property against oppressive taxation as to give privileges and immunities never contemplated by the founders of the Government.

If the decision of the majority had stricken down all the income-tax sections, either because of unauthorized exemptions or because of defects that could have been remedied by subsequent legislation, the result would not have been one to cause anxiety or regret, for in such a case Congress could have enacted a new statute that would not have been liable to constitutional objections. But the serious aspect of the present decision is that by a new interpretation of the Constitution it so ties the hands of the legislative branch of the Government that without an amendment of that instrument, or unless this court at some future time should return to the old theory of the Constitution, Congress can not subject to taxation, however great the needs or pressing the necessities of the Government, either the invested personal property of the country, stocks, bonds, and investments of all kinds, or the income arising from the renting of real estate, or from the yield of personal property, except by the grossly unequal and unjust rule of apportionment among the States. Thus undue and disproportioned burdens are placed upon the many, while the few, safely intrenched behind the rule of apportionment among the States on the basis of numbers, are permitted to evade their share of the responsibility for the support of the Government ordained for the protection of the rights of all.

I can not assent to an interpretation of the Constitution that impairs and cripples the just powers of the National Government in the essential matter of taxation and at the same time discriminates against the greater part of the people of our country.

The practical effect of the decision to-day is to give to certain kinds of property a position of favoritism and advantage inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our social organization and to invest them with power and influence that may be perilous to that portion of the American people upon whom rests the larger part of the burdens of the Government and who ought not to be subjected to the dominion of aggregated wealth any more than the property of the country should be at the mercy of the lawless.

Under the interpretation given the Constitution by the decision of the majority of the court, a man might own a million acres of productive real estate, or a thousand business blocks and skyscrapers, and yet could not be made to pay a cent for the support of the General Government by the application of any practical method. He might own all the stocks and bonds of all the railways of the United States; he might own all the bonds—State, county, and municipal—of the United States, and yet under that interpretation could not be made to pay a cent to the support of the Federal Government. I thought then, and I think now, that the decision of the majority of the court was wrong, and that the dissenting opinions of Harlan, Brown, White, and Jackson were right.

Justice Brown, in his dissenting opinion, says:

Even the specter of socialism is conjured up to frighten Congress from laying taxes upon the people in proportion to their ability to pay them. * * * While I have no doubt that Congress will find some means of surmounting the present crisis, my fear is that in some moment of national peril this decision will rise up to frustrate its will and paralyze its arm. I hope it may not prove the first step toward the submergence of the liberties of the people in a sordid despotism of wealth.

Justice Jackson, in his dissenting opinion, on page 705, says:

The practical operation of the decision is not only to disregard the great principle of equality in taxation, but the further principle that in the imposition of taxes for the benefit of the Government the burdens thereof should be imposed upon those having the most ability to bear them. This decision, in effect, works out a directly opposite result in relieving the citizens having the greater ability, while the burdens of taxation are made to fall most heavily and oppressively upon those having the least ability to pay.

Justice White, in his dissenting opinion, on page 712, said:

The injustice of the decision points to the error of adopting it. It takes invested wealth and reads it into the Constitution as a favored and protected class of property which can not be taxed without apportionment.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PROUTY. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman will find the report of that case where one of the judges, now the chief justice of the court, declared that that decision of the Supreme Court was an additional amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; that runs through all the dissenting opinions. That decision, however, ended the efforts of the Federal Government to reach that class of property for taxation until 1909, when Congress inserted in the Payne-Aldrich bill section 38, providing for an income tax on corporations. This act was attacked in the same manner and for the same reasons as the act of 1894.

But the Supreme Court, in the case of Flint v. The Stone-Tracy Co., reported in the Two hundred and twentieth United States Reports, page 107, sustained the constitutionality of that section. It is now claimed by supporters of this bill that the Supreme Court in that case laid down a rule broad enough to support the income provision of this bill. I wish that I could concur in that opinion, but I can not after a most careful study of the case.

It is true that the Supreme Court in the Flint case holds that section 38 levies an income or occupation tax, and does not sustain the tax on the ground that it is a franchise tax.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Will the gentleman from New York give me 10 minutes more time?

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose so if the gentleman is going to yield it all away.

Mr. PROUTY. Well, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee; I like to discuss legal questions.

Mr. HULL. Did the gentleman read the Spreckels decision in connection with the suit on which it was based and also in connection with the Flynt case?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; I have read them.

Mr. HULL. The basis of the doctrine on which this bill is predicated was the holding in the Spreckels case.

Mr. PROUTY. There is where lawyers will disagree, as they seem to in the Pollock case. But in the Pollock case the court held that the income-tax law was invalid largely because it was a tax upon property owned, the income from owned property.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Has not the Supreme Court always held that an occupation tax was valid?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; a pure occupation tax; but anyone who will candidly study this bill can hardly say it is a pure occupation tax.

If you will turn again to page 161 of the same report you will find the distinction clearly and accurately made. The court says:

The thing taxed is not the mere dealing in merchandise—

As is undertaken to be done in this case—in which the actual transactions may be the same, whether conducted by individuals or corporations, but the tax is laid upon the privileges which exist in conducting business with the advantages which inhere in the corporate capacity of those taxed, which are not enjoyed by private firms or individuals.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; for a question.

Mr. HULL. I want to ask the gentleman if the court, in saying that, was not simply combating the contention of the complaining party to the effect that the classification was a harsh and arbitrary one which imposed this tax on corporations, while it exempted individuals and copartnerships doing the same business in the same manner, and the Supreme Court answered by saying that Congress found the basis of classification and wrote it into the statute.

Mr. PROUTY. Pardon me, but I can not submit for a speech. I will answer the gentleman's question by referring down to a latter part of the same paragraph, from which I read:

In the Pollock case, as we have seen, the tax was held unconstitutional, because it was in effect a direct tax on the property solely because of its ownership.

I am not going to discuss whether the Supreme Court, in the Flint case, was right or wrong.

On page 150 the Supreme Court says:

In the present case the tax is not payable unless there be a carrying on or doing of business in the designated capacity, and this is made the occasion for the tax, measured by the standard prescribed. The difference between the acts is not merely nominal, but rests upon substantial differences between the mere ownership of property and the actual doing of business in a certain way.

Then, again, on page 151, the court says:

The tax under consideration, as we have construed the statutes, may be described as an excise upon the particular privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity.

I am wholly unable to understand how any lawyer can claim that the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Flint v. the Stone-Tracy Co. would uphold the provisions of the present bill. But I am nevertheless in favor of the passage of the bill and putting it squarely up to the Supreme Court again. Chief Justice White is now the only one upon the bench who was on the bench at the time of the hearing of the Pollock case. There are eight new members now on that bench, and I do not believe that it would be judicial sacrilege to express the hope, or even the belief, that enough of those new members of the court entertain the broad views so forcefully expressed by Justices Harlan, White, Brown, and Jackson, and would gladly unite with Chief Justice White in "restoring to the Constitution its old-time interpretation," giving Congress power to levy burdens with some reference to ability to bear them. But in the meantime I profoundly hope the States will ratify the constitutional amendment now proposed. That would clothe Congress with power to pass a law reaching all classes of incomes. The present bill does not reach fully the situation. Hampered by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Pollock case, even as limited by the Flint and Spreckels cases, the framers of this bill have been compelled to leave untouched for taxation the individual incomes derived from real estate, municipal bonds, and other fixed investments. I hope soon to be able to vote for a bill that will tax all incomes from whatever source derived.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire at the outset to congratulate my distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], the author of this bill, upon the excellence of the work which by patient toil and profound study he has wrought and laid before this House. It marks a distinct advance in the use of the taxing power of the Federal Government. It is true progressiveism, moving along intelligent, conservative, and well-defined lines.

It is not surprising that we find many of those on the Republican side of the Chamber standing in opposition to this method of taxation. In so doing they are entirely consistent with their party's course throughout its history. They are thoroughly in line with their platform of 1888, wherein that party declared that before it would trench upon the protective tariff system of the country it would reduce the excise tax upon dealing in tobacco and intoxicating liquors.

It is proper to say, I think, that different motives control the Republican Members who are in opposition to this measure.

Some of them are opposed to it because it is abhorrent to them to tax wealth, but, I think, the great majority of those who are opposed to the bill are opposed to it because it threatens the protective tariff system which their party has nurtured so long.

Mr. Chairman, it is not strange that the question of taxation has always been a central one throughout our Government's history. The question of taxation—the taking of the substance accumulated by the people in order to sustain and support organized society—is and must be the chief concern of the members of that society.

The taxing function of a government is at once its most delicate and its most tremendous power. The Democratic Party has stood consistently by the principle that this delicate, dangerous but essential power was given for one purpose and one only—that is to enable the Government to live. We believe that it may justly collect from the citizen in return for the protection it assures him such of his substance (equality with his fellows in benefits and burdens to be maintained) as is essential to sustain the Government and enable it to perform those duties necessary to the preservation of his rights and liberties and the promotion of his well-being under the law and the Constitution, but not one penny more. The Republican Party has taught, and wrought into law the teaching, that this power may be so manipulated as not only to collect revenues for the Government, but also insure profits to individuals.

The Republican Party organized as a sectional party, and gaining control of the country as such became early in its history the subservient agent of special interests and dedicated itself to their service. That party was the direct descendant of the Whig and Federal organizations. The Whig Party was its father; the Federal Party was its grandfather. It has developed few of the virtues of its father, and in its very infancy it showed an inheritance of all the vices of its grandparent. It seized the taxing power of the Government, and to an extent far greater than its forbears dared to go it has exercised that power, not primarily to raise just sufficient revenue to sustain and support an economically administered Government, but in order to enable a few men to gather into their private coffers the substance of many.

Mr. Chairman, it was the custom of ancient Rome to "farm out" the taxes imposed upon those who were subject to her imperial sway. For so much paid into her coffers an individual was granted the right to collect and retain the taxes of a province, and he in turn would sell to others the rights to this subdivision, and to that and behind these tax gatherers was thrown the force of Roman law and the power of Roman arms to grind from subject peoples the fruitage of their labor. Through long centuries she spread her sway and wrought her iron will, but the time came when she sought to cross the Rhine and bring beneath the Roman eagles the tribute of the tribes of ancient Germany. The world knows the result. To the north of the Lippe that proud Germanic race lured the legions of Varus and destroyed them utterly. They broke the force of Roman power and brought her prestige to the dust. They would not pay to a satrap of even mighty Rome.

Those men who in the depths of the German wilderness spurned Rome and all her glory, humbled her pride, and broke the circle of her world-engulfing power were the progenitors of the mighty race which has builded and peopled this Republic. And yet to-day we see a great political party committed to the doctrine of farming out the taxes, as it were, of exerting the taxing power for the benefit of individuals, and we see that party supported by intelligent, honest men.

Mr. Chairman, the protective-tariff system has had behind it the most ingenious and insidious influences that ever backed a cause. No political principle, no economic policy, no religious creed has ever drawn into the arena of debate and disputation nimbler, keener, or more incisive intellects than has this.

When the Nation was young and but an agricultural country—it having been England's policy to discourage manufactures in the colonies for the sake of her own trade—it was said that the Nation must stimulate its manufactories and that the people could well afford to make the sacrifices required in order to develop her resources as a war measure. This was the soundest basis, let it be said, upon which the system ever rested, but long, long ago that ceased to be a reason. Then came the plea of minority.

The people were told that they must protect infant industries; that the Government must be ward for newborn babes. This was plausible for a time, but at length they began to see whiskers creeping out from beneath the swaddling clothes. The infants had become careless about shaving, and there was no infant's clothing to be seen hanging out on the wash line. A gentle hint was given to the powers that were that the public did not feel called upon to support these industries through a second childhood. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then the ingenuity of Republican leadership developed another idea, and we were gravely informed that the protection was costing us nothing; that the foreigner paid the tax. Why, I remember when every Republican orator in the land taught that, asserting it with a gravity and a seriousness that was astounding. No one thinks of teaching that to-day. The man who would make that statement to an intermediate class in the public schools of the country would be laughed to scorn.

When the utter nonsense of this had become apparent there was developed the beautiful theory that by reason of prohibiting foreign importations our domestic production would be so stimulated that competition among the home manufacturers would reduce prices to the home consumer. The people listened and pondered; they said, "Now, that seems reasonable; that is assuredly economic wisdom; at last the touchstone has been located; the economic truth of the ages has been discovered; the secret of the sphinx is ours." They voted the Republican ticket, the Republican leadership smiled and hoisted the tariff some more. The masters of the Republican Party chuckled in their glee. The people settled down to await the coming competition, the farmer plowed and the carpenter drove his nails, the shoemaker plied his awl and the blacksmith wrought his daily task while the mothers of the land chanted their babies to slumber and to dreams with the new-found melody of—

Bye o' baby, don't you cry,
The tariff'll cheapen things by and by.

The days passed and the years went by, and the consumer began to get impatient; he began to look about him. Some things were cheapened indeed, but when he compared them with world prices he found they had not cheapened enough. He sought for that promised competition and suddenly awoke to the fact that there was none. The day of the trust had come, and we were informed that the old aphorisms about competition were antiquated and absurd in this modern day of Republican economics. "Why," they said, "competition is ruinous; combination is the only hope of industrial integrity."

Given a tariff high enough to prevent the influx of foreign-made goods, the domestic producers proceeded to organize themselves into divers corporations; then these corporations proceeded to organize holding corporations and transfer the stock, which in most instances was pumped full of water, to these latter, in trust, and the "trustees" fixed the prices, often at both the buying and selling ends of the line, and with competition at home checked and foreign competition shut out by the tariff wall, the consumer stood "at the mercy of Tiberius."

Not only this, but the consumer awoke to another fact—that is, that the producer, whom he was taxing himself to favor, had one price upon his products for home folks, whose taxes he was getting, and a lesser price for that foreigner who once—in his dreams—paid the tax.

His indignation began to creep up to the danger point, and once again the ingenious spirits in the Republican Party turned to their splendid imaginations for inspiration. It came. "'Tis true," they said, with an affectation of candor, "that the tariff is no longer necessary as a war measure; 'tis true that the infant industries are full-grown bearded men; 'tis true we were mistaken about the foreigner paying the tax; ''tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true' that we were deceived as to the efficacy of domestic competition; but, O citizens of the Republic, we must maintain the tariff for the benefit of American labor."

I heard of an American laborer who sought to buy a machine and wrote to an American manufacturer for the price. A stupid clerk by mistake sent him the export instead of the domestic price list. He did not notice this, and was surprised and delighted to find that he could obtain it cheaper than his neighbors had purchased by almost half. He sent in his order, and by return mail was advised of the error, and the domestic price was quoted nearly twice as great as that which it was proposed to charge the man abroad. Quite naturally he was puzzled, and he went to his protectionist Representative in Congress for an explanation. "Why is this?" he said. "Why should I be compelled to give twice as much labor—for my labor is my sole purchasing power—for that machine as the foreigner gives?" And his Representative responded, "Why, my dear fellow, you must do that to protect American labor." [Laughter.]

When Madame Roland was being led to the scaffold she gazed about her, and, divining the sordid and selfish ambitions which, in the name of liberty, were sending her and others to their deaths, exclaimed, "O Liberty! Liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name!"

Looking around us at the sordid selfishness and grasping greed which has held this Republic with a strangle hold for near half a century, are we not tempted to copy her pathetic remark and exclaim, "O American Labor! American Labor! how many crimes are committed in thy name!" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The grim humor of the situation began to dawn upon the American consumer, and the masters, quick to catch the first note of alarm, took up the American-labor cry, the full-dinner-pail argument, and to cap it all cried out in anguish: "Oh, men, think of all these things and think then of that awful panic of 1891, induced by the Democrats going into power two years after that, in 1893!" I am waiting with some interest to see how long it will be after the Democratic victory, which is coming this year, before Republican orators will be charging the Democratic Party with responsibility for the Roosevelt panic of 1907. [Applause and laughter.]

"You shall have relief," they said. "We can not touch the tariff, it is true, because of labor, but rely upon the Republican Party. We will find a way. Assuredly, oh, most assuredly! A new figure has arisen in this world; within him are blended all the virtues and all the wisdom of the ages. Constitutions are nothing in his sight; before his tread all barriers fall; at his behest the rivers will run from the seas; the laws of supply and demand be restored or discontinued, as he may choose; the sun will stand still while he fights the battles of the Lord, and within four brief years you shall see the millennium; it is believed that T. Roosevelt may himself hold the proxy of the Messiah and represent him at the second coming. Who knows but that he is himself the Messiah reincarnated? He has not denied it. [Laughter.] At any rate he will punish these cruel malefactors of great wealth who have been guilty of exercising the business opportunities which our laws, by their favoritism, have offered them. Will you not, Teddy?" "Will I," said Teddy, "will I? Watch me; I shall be delighted." [Laughter.]

We have observed, of course, that Mr. T. Roosevelt, amid all his multitudinous activities, did not touch the tariff. Mr. Roosevelt was a wise man in his day and generation. He was able to assail "My dear Harriman," but the tariff barons—not he. He unloaded the tariff proposition upon the expansive shoulders of the good-natured gentleman whom he selected to succeed him—for one term.

Mr. Taft having been informed by Mr. Roosevelt that he was to take his place laughed in his good-natured way and went forth to make some speeches in 1907. The mutterings of the people had become a rumble. "There must be a revision of the tariff in the interest of the consumers," they said. "Why certainly," responded the wise men of the East. "Why certainly," responded the leaders of the Republican Party. The gentleman from New York, Mr. SERENO E. PAYNE, was then the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to which tariff bills are referred in the House. He is not now, but he was then. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] "Why certainly," said Mr. PAYNE, "we will revise the tariff"; and sometimes I think he really meant it. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Nelson W. Aldrich, was then the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to which tariff bills are referred in the Senate. He is not now, but he was then. Under the Constitution revenue measures must originate in the House, but the Senate can amend them. I can not positively vouch for it, but I have no doubt that Mr. Aldrich looked over the Senate and carefully took note of those who had been and were sure to be elected as Senators to the Sixty-first Congress, and then, "Why certainly," said Mr. Aldrich, "there must be a revision—a revision—of the tariff; strange I had not thought of that before; why certainly," and he smiled. He met Mr. Taft and they talked awhile, and they both smiled. I imagine, also, that Mr. SMOOT, of Utah, not then, but soon to go, upon the Senate Finance Committee, met them and they all three smiled. "Why certainly, certainly; Calpurnia hath had her sweeter dreams, and we must revise the tariff."

Mr. Taft, as I have said, went forth to make some speeches, and in the very heart of New England indicated that he favored revision downward. New England smiled and smiled and smiled.

The Republican convention met and adopted a platform. Had the voters read it in the light of past experiences I do not believe they would have permitted themselves to have been again deceived by campaign promises and stump-speech platitudes. When I was a schoolboy and studied logic I remember something of a figure or a principle called "reductio ad absurdum." The Republican Party's platitudes often reminded me of it, but never was it brought as forcibly home to me as when I read the tariff plank of the Republican platform of 1908. If it had been serious it would have been ridiculous; being not serious, it was a criminal trifling with the hopes and aspirations and rights of a generous and patient people. It declared for a revision, but with no promise of reduction. It said the protective principle must be maintained, and that it could be best maintained by laying a duty sufficient to equal the cost of production at home and abroad and maintain a reasonable profit to the American producer.

For sheer absurdity, among all the utterances of political platforms since parties began, I am committed to that.

Difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, forsooth! Why, gentlemen, Mr. Charles Emery, of that famous Tariff Board upon which the President relies, speaking at a banquet of the American Association of Woolen and Worsted Manufacturers in New York some time ago, is reported to have said:

> There are certain things that are very difficult to get, and one thing that, according to the platform of the Republican Party—and, incidentally, that does not mean anything to me except that I have been given the job according to that platform—is to try to get the cost of production. I thank you all, gentlemen, that you did not laugh. I frankly say right here that this idea of settling things on cost alone is all nonsense.

If cost could be obtained, what country would you take as the standard for the cost abroad in order to calculate the difference? Germany, Japan, China, India, with all their different standards of labor? And, having settled upon a country, what factory in that country and in this would you make the basis? What elements are to be considered?

And a guaranty of "reasonable profits," indeed! What right, legal or ethical, has a party to take this Government of a whole people and pledge itself to use its taxing power so as guarantee to individuals a reasonable profit? [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet I know some Republicans who smile at the Socialist as a dreamer or a crank.

I claim no powers of divination, but I am going to venture one prophecy, and that is that in the Republican platform to be adopted at Chicago this year you will not find that expression about guaranteeing "a reasonable profit." The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] on yesterday had an opportunity to present that expression of the platform to this House in a legislative way. He made a motion to recommit the sugar bill with instructions, and the instructions were:

> To report the same back to the House amended so as to eliminate from the sugar schedule the Dutch standard color test, the differential on refined sugar—

Which two things, by the way, he might have eliminated in the Payne-Aldrich bill, but did not—> provide for a tariff on sugar that shall measure the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad.

But not one word did the gentleman from New York have in his motion about guaranteeing the "reasonable profit."

Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in this short time deserted his party platform of 1908?

But I digress. In 1908 the people trusted them once more. Mr. Taft and his party were triumphant, a special session of Congress was called, and the farce began. The history is so recent I need not repeat it.

The farce ended August 5, 1909, when the President attached his signature to the Payne-Aldrich bill and accompanied that signature with a public apology to the people of the United States. The people accepted the bill because they had to, but they declined to accept the apology. Congress adjourned, and the President started shortly afterwards on that first funeral march to the western coast. He stopped long enough at Winona, Minn., to apologize again. I have not his exact words before me, but I can quote them in substance. He said the bill was the best tariff bill ever written. He did not smile. Neither did the people. They ha-haed, and when November, 1910, came, the earliest opportunity presented, the worm turned and a mighty people arose in their wrath and swept from power in the only positions they could then reach—the House of Representatives and certain seats in the Senate—that party which had deceived them so often with its hypocritical cant and its disingenuous pretensions.

Mr. Taft said something else in that Winona speech. I give him credit for being a candid, honest man. Discussing the woolen schedule, he frankly admitted that it failed to measure up to the platform promises of his party, and he made the astounding statement that when an effort was attempted to give the people relief from the exactions of the woolen tariff that it was found that the interests in the Republican Party brought about by a combination of woolgrowers and woolen manufacturers in 1867 was so strong that his party could not stand against it; that they dictated terms to it and compelled the woolen tariff to stand, with the alternative of no legislation at all if they touched it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] How pitiful! The party of Abraham Lincoln held up with a sandbag and forced to stand and deliver! This upon the authority of the first citizen of the United States. Forced to violate its plighted faith, forced to disregard its solemn word.

Mr. Chairman, I am a believer in Democratic principles. I am a partisan, but I try to be a polite one. Notwithstanding my opposition to the fundamental principles of the Republican Party, I recognize that its has chapters in its history of which the future will take favorable note; but because I am a patriot before I am a partisan I say to you that I hung my head in shame when I read and realized the truth of that expression of the President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It does not reflect upon the honesty of the masses of the Republican Party or of the people of the United States, because. let it be said in candor, they did not know it. Those interests had obtained their strangle hold unawares to them. But they know it now. The President himself has vouched for it. What will they do? I think I know what they will do. They will arise in their wrath and smite as they have smitten. They will cleanse the temple of this Republic.

But there is more to the history. In 1910 a people, indignant at their betrayal, turned to the Democratic Party and elected a Democratic House of Representatives, as well as a number of Senators. That Congress was called in special session and met in April, 1911, and a Democratic House proceeded with the revision of that schedule which the President had denounced. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We remembered what the President had said about the woolen schedule, and at the earliest opportunity there was laid before him by a Democratic House and a close Senate a new woolen schedule, moderate in its character, conservative in its items, but constructed so as to preserve the revenues and at the same time bring relief to the people. We demonstrated that there was a party which the woolen interests could not control and make to eat from their hand. That bill, the just answer to a people's just demand, went to that President who had freely acknowledged the violation of faith by his own party on that schedule, and he vetoed it upon the sole ground that he himself was ignorant. He would not take the judgment of the Representatives fresh from the people, commissioned to do what he regretted his own party had not done, notwithstanding they had all the information and more than his party had when it framed the Payne-Aldrich bill. He must wait until Calpurnia had dreamed again. He must wait for the cunning genius of a tariff board to flower and fruit, though he needed it not when he signed the Payne bill.

And this was repeated as to other matters and other schedules of the tariff.

Mr. Chairman, I should gladly support this excise bill now before us upon its own merits, even if it is were not necessary as a measure to supply the revenues that will be lost to the Government if sugar be placed upon the free list, because I believe that it is essential to the preservation of the institutions of Government in this Republic that there should be laid in some manner or in some form a direct tax, a tax which the people will feel and which they will realize they are paying.

I believe that one of the dangers to our Federal Government's stability is that under our present system the people do not realize when they pay the Federal taxes. The hand of the taxgatherer is hidden. We know quite well when we pay tribute to State or county or municipality, because we pay directly, hand over the cash and receive nothing but a tax receipt in return. The Federal stipend is wrapped up in the coat or the blanket that you buy for yourself, the dress you purchase for your wife, the shoes for your child, concealed in the plow and the hoe and the ax, in the food which the laboring man buys; and the trouble of it is that the consumer pays this tax whether what he buys is imported or made in this country. If it is imported the Treasury gets the tax. If manufactured here the manufacturer gets it.

My friends, the growth of socialism in this country within recent years has been such as to cause all thoughful men to pause and ponder. Even I can remember when socialism was regarded as an incoherent, meaningless passion; but the vote has grown by leaps and bounds, and to-day a representative of that doctrine sits in the House of Representatives of the United States. I do not profess to understand the creed in all its refinements and ramifications, but I understand in a general way that one of its principles is common ownership of property; that no man shall own anything but all men shall own all things. That is not of itself a popular doctrine; there is a principle implanted in the heart of every man which leads him to wish to be able to say, "This is mine, the fruit of my labor, the increment of my toil." Why, then, has the party of that doctrine gathered such momentum? Perhaps it is true that the rapid introduction into our population of a foreign element, some of whom know nothing of, and many of whom care nothing for, our constitutional limitations and restrictions has been in part responsible.

But more than all else I believe that it is due to the fact that men have looked about them; have seen the inequalities imposed by the special interests that have so long been in control of the taxing power of this Republic; have seen the great forces of the Government manipulated so that one man might live in the sweat of other men's brows; and restless and discontent, disgusted with such legislative legerdemain they have rushed to the other extreme and embraced a doctrine foreign to our governmental hopes and aspirations.

If a system of direct taxation such as is proposed by this bill be established the citizens of this country will feel Federal taxation, and when they feel that taxation they will begin to guard Federal expenditures.

I think it was Edmund Burke who said that if you would hide the hand of the taxgatherer in the intricacies of a tariff you could tax even an Englishman down to his last loaf of bread and his last rag of clothing without evoking protest, and that philosophy holds good, in a measure, even unto this day.

Because the people of this country have not realized when they were paying Federal taxes extravagance in Federal expenditures has resulted. They have come all too often to regard an appropriation from the Federal Treasury as so much "picked up," not as so much spent. The popular thing for a member of a State legislature to do is to save in expenditures. Why? Because the State tax is a direct tax. Sometimes it seems that the most popular thing a Representative in Congress can do is to get an appropriation. Why? Because the Federal tax is indirect and the constituency, though it is composed of the same people represented by the State legislator, does not realize that it is paying.

But they do pay, Mr. Chairman. Aye, sir, not only do they pay to the Federal Treasury, but for every dollar which they pay through the tariff laws into the till of the Treasury they pay from $5 to $7, according to best estimates, that go not for governmental purposes, but into the pocket of some domestic producer.

Not only has this indirect system of taxation resulted in extravagance in Federal expenditures, but it has resulted in the centralization of governmental powers in the Federal entity.

Why, sir, the tendency is constantly growing for the States and local communities to shift upon the Federal Government duties that they should perform. How often are we urged to support Federal appropriations for the construction of highways?

How often does this demand come from citizens who would not think of voting to bond their county for that purpose? Why? The county tax is direct; the Federal tax is indirect. And yet if the Federal Government did it, it would cost from two to three times as much as for the community to do it. And so of many matters.

Mr. Chairman, this is a good bill; it is a splendid bill; it is in accord wth soundest governmental principles and best and bravest Democratic policies. The criticisms of it seem to me to be almost puerile. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] thinks it will not reach men like Mr. Carnegie or Mr. Rockefeller. I think he is mistaken; but suppose he is correct; suppose, under the decision in the income-tax case—the Pollock case—this bill can not reach them. Shall we for that reason refuse to use our legitimate powers to tax others who are able to pay? For shame!

I believe the people will approve this bill, and will indorse our party for proposing and passing it. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party has wandered long in the wilderness. Internal dissensions have dissipated our forces and disheartened our followers, yet, turning neither to the right nor to the left, but holding fast to the faith of the fathers and walking ever in the light of living issues, we have moved out from the swamp with its tangled thickets and its fetid waters, and standing to-day upon the mountain top we gaze with rapt vision into the promised land. We have the House of Representatives now, and I believe the people of this country indorse its actions and approve the profert of intention which it has made and that next November they will say unto our party—

Well done, good and faithful servant. Thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I certainly shall not attempt to flatter myself by thinking that what I shall say upon this question will be of any particular interest to the Members of this House or to the country; but I wish to say a few words upon it because I regard the bill, connected with its companion piece, as the most stupendous piece of demagoguery and fraud that has ever been attempted to be perpetrated upon the American people in the name of American politics. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I characterize it as possessing the element of fraud, as it pretends to relieve the people from taxation, but, in fact, adds to their burdens. I call it demagoguery because it will be called before the public an income tax, when in fact it is not. It is wholly unscientific and moves away from that class of wealth a true income tax would reach. By its terms it exempts corporate and idle wealth and the swollen fortunes of the country. Can the "revivified" Democratic Party afford to stand for a makeshift measure which will discourage the adoption of a true income tax at a time when we need only the ratification of the constitutional amendment by six additional States to make it effective, and we have two new States ready to reduce the required number to four?

Mr. Chairman, I do not think any gentleman on that side of the House can charge me with being extremely partisan.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, no; no.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman may well repeat out of order, "Oh, no; no"; but when the gentleman has stood here and voted against the measures adopted by the oath-bound caucus on that side of the House as often as I have voted for measures not approved by our caucuses and conferences, he may then shake his gory locks at me for being a partisan.

The truth is that I have promised myself, at least, that I shall speak out against fraud and demagoguery wherever I find it, whether it be in our party or in your party. I have long ago made up my mind that the statement so often heard, especially on that side of the House, that this country is a government of political parties, is not correct. This Government is, or ought to be, a government by the people; and I say to you, Members of this House, that, taking the last 20 years of the history of this country, every great national question that has received the sanction of Congress or of any considerable number of the State legislatures has come about by the organization of the people of this country almost independently of the political organizations.

I do not mean to condemn political organizations by that statement, but I mean to say that political organizations follow and do not lead in expressing the public will in this country, and so I deny the statement that we have a government of political parties.

I have voted for every tariff bill that has been brought out by the Ways and Means Committee on that side of the House, with the exception of the chemical bill and the sugar bill. I did not vote for the chemical bill because I regarded it as an honest Democratic measure. It was not an attempt to reduce the tariff; it was rather an attempt to raise it by levying duties upon noncompetitive articles, and therefore I voted against it. I voted against the sugar bill because I believed that you gentlemen on that side did not believe in it. There is scarcely a single Member on that side of the House who would have voted for it if he thought there was any chance of its becoming a law. I voted for the other bills because there was an honest difference of opinion as to whether or not the protection carried by them would destroy American industries. Indeed, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who, I see, has now left the Hall, on every occasion made the statement that the duties carried in these bills equaled the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, making this statement, I assume, in the joy of that new-found definition of his of a tariff for revenue. Taking his word for it, having the same confidence in a Republican Senate and a Republican President that the Democratic Party always evidences when confronted with a real responsibility, I voted for the bills in the hope that a Republican Senate would reframe them to make them into fairly acceptable tariff bills.

But here, gentlemen, we are face to face with this bill and its sister bill, that proposes not to place a duty upon a revenue basis, but absolutely to destroy the public revenues and at the same time to destroy one of the great American industries. Three or four facts stand out undisputed in all the investigations which you gentlemen have conducted here and in all of the information which has been gathered and in all the discussion of these two bills. The first is—

(a) That we are producing through the beet-sugar factories and the cane sugar of Louisiana fully one-third of all the sugar that we consume in the country.

(b) The next fact admitted by the Hardwick investigation and the Ways and Means Committee is that this is the only independent sugar industry that exists in the country or in the world, and that this constitutes the only competition that we have by which prices may be reduced.

(c) It is admitted that this competition did within the last year serve to lower the price of sugar to the American consumer almost 1 cent per pound.

(d) It is admitted but for this competition the price of sugar in this country is largely controlled by the Sugar Trust, and that control failing at any time the fixing of prices passes to the great foreign syndicate, which, by means of the Brussels conference, controls the prices of sugar on the world's market as certainly as does the board of directors of the Sugar Trust control the affairs of that corporation. Still, back of this combination stands Russia, by her bounty fed and highly protected pauper-labor industry, dominating the sugar market, as does Argentina the coffee market, of the world.

Now, if that is true, I say to you that this sugar bill is a fraud and a deception, because you hope to go out with it and purchase the votes of the American people under the promise of cheaper sugar when you must know that when this home competition is destroyed that sugar will not be lower than it is now, but will be higher.

Is it not clear that by free sugar in this country you place it in the power of the European syndicate and Russia to cover into their treasury the duties you propose to remove from American importations? This was England's experience, and she was forced to restore her duties to protect her own treasury. It had been our own experience in the coffee trade. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has presented at this session of Congress an almost unanswerable argument that we shall be compelled to restore a duty on coffee to prevent our people from paying the expenses of the Argentina Government exacted through the high prices of coffee by the Government monopoly of the Argentina Republic. The remedy for this condition of affairs, the way to bring cheaper sugar for the American consumers, is pointed out by the greatest sugar statistician of the world, a man who all admit to be disinterested and fair and able. In his evidence in the hearings Mr. W. P. Willet said (pp. 3556–57):

As showing the ultimate effect of home production equal to or surpassing home consumption, I call attention specially for earnest consideration to the fact that in 1910 we reached this desired consummation within 74,000 tons, and as a result we were almost independent of Europe; so much so, in fact, that we got our supplies from Cuba at over one-half cent per pound under world's prices, during which time one man (Santa Maria) was carrying on a big bull speculation in Europe in which we would certainly have been involved but for this limited amount we required that year. In 1911 the Cuban crop fell short of 1910 by 320,898 tons, and we required 212,182 tons from abroad to complete our supplies; hence we were involved in the world's prices in 1911, and the result was a hue and cry against the high prices of sugar. I am not making an argument, but am simply pointing to the facts that appear to me to make the consideration of the increase in our local supplies of greater importance in legislation than a reduction of duties beyond certain limits, those limits to be such as will positively exclude all sugars outside those of our States and dependencies.

In all these analyses I reach the same conclusion—that to decrease the price of sugar to the consumer, increase the domestic production as rapidly as possible (p. 3978).

The domestic industry in the western part of the country represents an investment of over a hundred million dollars, made under the promise not alone of our party, but of your party, because do not forget that under the free trade in sugar which you gentlemen seem to be so proud of throwing in the faces of certain leaders on this side, when that condition of affairs existed your party put a duty of 40 per cent on sugar.

Now, then, following that line of legislation, not only has a hundred million dollars been invested in this industry in this country, but hundreds of thousands of American farmers have taken their effects and property and camped under the shadow of irrigation works and gone into the business of producing sugar to feed the American people.

Now, if there is anything in this country that deserves the praise and the pride of the American people it is the hopefulness of the western farmer. In a few weeks he will take his plow from out of the shed, if he has any shed, and will bring into action the farm implements of his business, and step forward with his heart full of hope—God bless him—to produce another crop. Does any man on this floor think that a single acre of sugar beets will be planted this next year if your bill becomes a law? You told us that the price of sugar went above 7 cents last year because of the failure of something like a quarter of a million tons of sugar in Cuba. What kind of a price would sugar be next year if it were given out that the great product of the western fields in this country of ours were to be cut off next year? It permits of not a shadow of doubt that sugar, under such circumstances, would be higher and not lower.

But, Mr. Chairman, I refuse to consider this subject alone from the viewpoint of saving a few cents per year to each American family in the purchase of sugar. The interest of every American citizen is broader than that. The production of 600,000 to 700,000 tons of sugar to continental United States involves large financial transactions and the employment of many laborers. To meet these expenses the bankers of the communities where such industries exist have stood by the farmers and factories to assist them in meeting temporarily these expenditures. The destruction of the industry means an unsettling of credits that may threaten the very financial quiet and stability of the country. Absolute free trade in sugar also means great disturbance of the industry in our island dependencies and Cuba and a lessening of their capacity to buy and consume American goods.

This is a trade, consisting in the main of flour and meats, in which the West is directly interested. I wish to set forth here a view of Porto Rico Progress. On February 1 this prominent Porto Rico paper stated the following editorially:

The consumer asks himself, "How does the tariff affect me?" It increases the daily cost of his sugar one-half cent. But does the American consumer know that, practically due to the tariff on sugar alone, a market for American goods has been developed in Porto Rico which will amount to $50,000,000 a year in another 12 months? This is where the great factor, human nature, otherwise known as selfishness, enters the equation.

Since 1898 (the year of the American occupation), the sugar industry of Porto Rico has increased from about $2,500,000 to $24,000,000. In the same period the purchases of Porto Rico from the United States have increased from about $1,500,000 to $34,600,000. In other words, the production of sugar in Porto Rico has become 10 times greater, and our purchases from the mainland are 22 times greater.

One-third of the wage earners in manufactories in this island (according to official data furnished by the Census Bureau) depend upon the sugar and molasses industry. The number of persons dependent upon each wage earner for support and the number of business establishments and minor industries which owe their existence to the sugar business are not known. To say that 50 per cent of the population is directly and vitally interested would be conservative. Any alteration in the tariff on sugar will immediately impair the purchasing power of 600,000 people who now buy from the United States and will ultimately affect 600,000 more.

In 1901 we bought from the United States $7,000,000 worth of goods. Last year we spent in her markets $34,600,000. Next year, if the tariff is not changed, the figure should be $50,000,000.

If the tariff on sugar is eliminated, the consumer in the United States may possibly save $1.25 a year, but the business men of the Nation will lose in the end half of their market in Porto Rico, meaning an annual loss of about $25,000,000.

Apart from the fact that the American consumer may get his sugar for $1.25 less a year, no one will benefit by putting sugar on the free list so much as Cuba. She now buys her machinery in the cheaper markets of Europe. She will continue doing so unless absolute free trade is granted, and this is too remote a possibility to be considered. In short, Cuba will fatten on the American sugar market and will spend the profits in Europe. Porto Rico, on the other hand, spends her earnings in the United States.

It is unnecessary to elaborate on this argument. Human nature is the same the world over, even in the United States Congress; and that supreme commander of human actions, Selfishness, will doubtless govern in this case as in all others.

The only point to be borne in mind is that by taking away the protection given us by the sugar tariff the United States will seriously injure one of her best customers. Porto Rico buys more from the United States than Russia, Spain, Austria, Japan, Turkey, and all of the East Indies. The United States sells more to this island than she does to any other country of South and Central America, except the Argentine. Porto Rico occupies twelfth place in the list of the markets of the United States. Her purchases from the mainland are greater than those of any other noncontiguous territory, exceeding those of the Philippine Islands by $10,000,000, Alaska by $9,000,000, and Hawaii by $7,000,000.

As a cold-blooded business proposition, will it pay the United States to throttle Porto Rico to benefit Cuba?

What is true of Porto Rico is also true to a large extent of Hawaii and the Philippines. While the effect on American trade with Cuba is not so direct as with Porto Rico, the 20 per cent preferential tariff, which reciprocity with that island gave her, has caused our trade to increase as rapidly in volume as with Porto Rico.

So the blow of destruction is not alone at the industry of the beet-sugar farmers of the West, but also at the market and the prices of the western farmer who produces wheat, flour, and meats.

There are some amusing things about this legislation. One of the most amusing things, gentlemen of the committee, is the argument that has been made on that side of the House that you are doing this to relieve the American people of taxation. I sat here and heard the very interesting and eloquent description of the eminent chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the great wrong that was done by the British Government by conferring upon some earl or some one else the privilege of taxing the right to do business in a certain market in London. You remember that, do you not, how eloquent he waxed about the wrong theory of government, that would tax the people by giving anyone the privilege of taxing the right to do business upon a certain market?

Then he proceeded to liken the protective duties or the revenue duties of America to the same thing as taxing the right to do business in the American markets. He then said, "We are going to take the $53,000,000 of taxes off the American market, away from the bellies of the American people." Mr. Chairman, where is he going to put the $53,000,000 tax? Can it be possible that this same man proposes to put the $53,000,000 of tax on the right of every man, every individual in the United States, to do any business at all? The proposition is proposterous and positively humorous. Is it wrong to tax the importer to do business in America? Then certainly it is wrong to tax an American citizen on the right to do business at home. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of demagoguery and nonsense indulged in in caviling at the revenue taxes of this Government raised by duties upon imports. So far as I am concerned, I am a protectionist; I have never pretended to be anything else.

I regard the doctrine of American protection as one of the cardinal principles of taxation in America. It has existed for many years, and the same gentleman who described this pathetic picture in London at the beginning of the debate upon the sugar bill before he sat down said that we must continue to collect a large amount of our taxes from the customs. It is not only a cardinal principle of the American system of taxation and of every party in this country, but of every country in the world. The time has arrived in the history and development of commerce predicted long ago by that great statesman of England, Lord Salisbury, when he said that the future commerce of the world was to be a war between tariffs. That time is here, and no subject could better illustrate it than this subject of the tax upon sugar, because we are confronted with the fact that every great government of the world, including even free-trade England, recognizes it as a fit subject for taxation. Oh, but gentlemen say we are going to take off this $53,000,000 of tax, because you levy it back on the people. Not only that, but it so raises the prices of commodities that you treble it and make it $150,000,000. Let us see how you propose to do it. You propose to do it by taxing the people who do business in this country with that same $53,000,000. Will the man who imports sugar pay the tax? Of course he will; not by this bill perhaps, because he is already taxed under the Republican bill, which provides for a corporation tax, but if he is not a corporation he will be taxed under this bill. Will the man who sells sugar at wholesale be taxed under your law? Yes. Will the jobber who sells it to the retail merchant be taxed? Yes, if the business is a corporation or has a net income of $5,000 or more. Then, in the name of common sense, what is to prevent all of these men from putting this tax back on the commodities which they sell in their business and thus making the consumer pay for it all? You have just listened here to a very able and eloquent speech by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], who shows you how all of this tax, whether levied by internal revenue or by customs duties, is eventually placed back upon the consumer. Will there be any difference in this tax and the tariff tax?

Oh, but you say the tariff is only paid by the man who imports and that he adds the tariff and that brings all local prices up to the same level with the foreign price with the tariff added. But you do not propose to tax everybody under this law. It is only the large concerns, the concerns of the country which fix the prices, the wholesale houses, the great department stores, the mail-order houses, and things of that sort which make the prices. They are the concerns who are to pay this tax unless they are incorporated. I should like you to tell me what would prevent them from putting this tax back upon the consumer, and when they do, do you think the small dealers will offer their goods at a lower price than the big concerns? And if you do, I will be willing to support your law. So I say that your scheme of relieving taxation is absolutely deceptive, and you would not be for it if you knew that you could pass it. Not only that, but the very distinction between a direct tax and an excise tax rests on the very proposition that the direct tax can not be shifted, while the excise tax and the indirect tax can be shifted. I do not ask you to take my word for it. I want to read to you here from the language of this Pollock decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON. This is a quotation from the eminent statesman, Albert Gallatin, for whom I believe Democrats have some respect. This is what he said in his sketch of the finances of the United States, published in November, 1796:

> The most generally received opinion, however, is that by direct taxes in the Constitution those are meant which are raised on the capital or revenue of the people; by indirect, such as are raised on their expense.

Again, the court itself in this decision said:

> Ordinarily all taxes paid primarily by persons who can shift the burden upon some one else, or who are under no compulsion to pay them are considered indirect taxes, but a tax upon property holders in respect of their estates, whether real or personal, or of the income yielded by such estates, and the payment of which can not be avoided, are direct taxes. (P. 558.)

You propose to sustain this law in the Supreme Court upon the proposition that it is a tax upon the expenditures or the expenses of the people and therefore one which can be shifted from the payee to some one else, and yet you say that you are relieving the people from taxation. There is a difference in the operation of this law and in the operation of a tariff law, and I will tell you what it is, in my judgment. The hearings before us on the two bills show this state of affairs, that in England, where they have only 40 per cent tax on sugar, the price of sugar has been eight-tenths of a cent less, on an average, per pound than it is in this country where we have a tax of 1.90. How do you escape the conclusion, then, that the exporter, or some one else than the consumer, pays about half of that tax?

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JACKSON. In a moment. Then the difference is this, that we do have some opportunity of shifting a tax that is levied as a customs duty on to some one else than the consumer, but when we levy an internal-revenue tax, such as we do upon tobacco and liquors, there is no opportunity to do it, but the consumer must pay the tax. So you have taken off the $53,000,000 of tax, half of which—according to the figures I have just quoted, and they are your figures—is not paid by the consumer, and you have put it back again in the form of a tax all of which must be paid by the consumer.

Mr. WARBURTON. I find from the English Statistical Abstract that the price of refined sugar plus the tariff averages about $1.70 per hundred. I would like to know where the gentleman gets his figures.

Mr. JACKSON. I quoted the figures from the report. The gentleman will find them there. I quoted them from the majority report. The same figures have been quoted over and over again by both sides in this debate. There can be no question about their correctness. Here is what Mr. UNDERWOOD himself says:

> In England refined sugar in bond is quoted for 1910 at 3.706 cents; in Germany, 3.640 cents; in Austria, 3.800 cents; in France, 4.070 cents; and in the United States, 3.532 cents. The result is that sugar is quoted in bond in the United States for the year 1910 cheaper than untaxed sugar in bond was quoted in any of the great European countries that produce sugar.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if in his discussion of where this tax will lie he is not overlooking the fact that under the law proposed and under discussion this afternoon the tax will not be placed upon those people who have under $5,000 a year income. Is that not true?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, that is true; and I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that, because I want to discuss it now. The gentleman calls my attention to the fact that those who have an income of less than $5,000 per annum are exempt from this law. Of course, the gentleman will understand that I have just tried to explain why I think everyone who buys sugar will pay this tax.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman stated that the wholesaler, the manufacturer, and the importer would pass this tax down in the price of sugar to the consumer. Is that not true?

Mr. JACKSON. I did.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does the gentleman suppose that the wholesaler will pass it all down and charge it up, notwithstanding the fact that he handles many other lines of goods?

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, I did not mean that.

Mr. BATHRICK. Consequently not so much will be passed to the consumer as under the tariff, would it?

Mr. JACKSON. I think that is true as to the price of sugar alone. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because it permits me to complete my argument upon that subject. Of course, the tax now being distributed over a number of articles, instead of upon sugar alone, the entire tax will not be placed upon sugar, but it will be placed upon all the articles the merchant handles, and therefore upon all the articles which we buy, and the people will pay it just as they now pay a part of it.

It will be handed along to the banker. It will be handed along to the dealer in clothing and other goods; to the dealer in groceries. When the outcome is figured up the American people will have paid this tax just the same as they pay any other revenue or customs tax. It is perfectly idle to argue that the tax of every section of the Payne-Aldrich bill is paid by the consumer, except the tax levied by section 38 of that law.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will not the gentleman concede that a tax was levied on the American people far in excess of the revenue collected by the tax on sugar? Was not the tax levied on the American people just in that proportion that the rate bears to the consumption?

Mr. JACKSON. I am perfectly willing to concede that the tariff is too high.

Mr. BATHRICK. The rest of the tax will be on the backs of the American consumer, if you take this tax off, even though it passes from the wholesaler down to the consumer.

Mr. JACKSON. That depends entirely on how much more tax you put on. I am willing to concede the tax on sugar is too high. I hope, and I believe the gentleman and his party hope, that the Republican Senate will send the bill back here with a duty of 1 or 1½ cents per pound on sugar.

Mr. BATHRICK. I do not hope so at all. I am for free sugar.

Mr. JACKSON (continuing). Abolishing the differential and the Dutch standard. I will vote for it, and I hope the gentleman will vote for it, because then he would show his sincerity before the American people in advocating a lower tax, and one that will mean lower prices to the consumer and at the same time sufficient protection to our domestic sugar industry.

Mr. BATHRICK. I will vote for the best I can get, and as near to it as I can get.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] permit me to ask my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] a question?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK], my colleague, whether he is also in favor of free wheat? I understand that he voted against reciprocity, as I did, upon that question.

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes; I certainly would do it if it redounded to the benefit of the people in the State and would make flour free also. I understand my colleague voted to prevent flour from being free.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague include in his question free wool? I would like to be enlightened.

Mr. WILLIS. I am coming to that. My colleague is saying that he is in favor of free sugar because he thinks sugar will be cheaper to the consumer. Is my friend from Ohio in favor of free wheat on the same theory?

Mr. BATHRICK. The bill you voted for puts flour on the free list.

Mr. WILLIS. But I voted against reciprocity and also the free-list bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I was absent from the Chamber for a moment, and I understand the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] stated that I brought this bill into the House knowing that it would not become a law and could not pass. I am here now, and I would like the gentleman to repeat his statement, so that I may understand.

Mr. JACKSON. I think I made no stronger statement than when I opened my remarks, which was that I think the entire measure, including free sugar, is a piece of rank demagoguery.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to understand what the gentleman said.

Mr. JACKSON. I remember no such remark as he quotes, except that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I did not understand it correctly.

Mr. JACKSON. I think I did say this, Mr. Chairman, and I am willing to repeat it, that neither he nor any other Member on that side of the House expects this bill to become a law, and that I believe no man on that side would vote for it if he did expect it to become a law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas, if he will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). That he has no warrant whatever for making any statement of that kind. This side of the House passed a wool bill that your side said could not pass, and we sent it to the President of the United States. It would be a law to-day if he had put his signature to it. We can not control the President of the United States. I believe that this bill will pass the Senate as well as the House, and that the President of the United States will not dare to veto it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want it to become a law.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, mere assertion and statement is very cheap, although it is hard sometimes, under the rule on the other side of the House, to get opportunity to make them from the minority side. But, Mr. Chairman, I voted for the gentleman's wool bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] has again expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas five minutes more.

Mr. JACKSON. I voted for the gentleman's wool bill, because, as I stated a moment ago, he told the House in the joy of his new-found definition of a tariff for revenue that the Government was in dire need of revenue, and that it was necessary to keep the tariff on raw wool, notwithstanding that his party had promised the people of the country that they would take the duty off of raw material. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now then, Mr. Chairman, the revenues have so increased within the year that that party can disregard the fact that they were willing to put a duty of 20 per cent on raw wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JACKSON. Just wait a moment, please. The revenues of the Government have become so opulent since that time, less than a year ago, that they can now disregard $53,000,000 of revenue and trade it off for a lawsuit.

This is the first time in the history of the country that any party has attempted to make a lawsuit legal tender or has attempted to coin a lawsuit into gold with which to pay the public expenditures; and so, notwithstanding the gentleman's statement that I was not authorized to state what I did a moment ago, I think I am fully warranted when I say that such legislation as that is an imposition and a deception upon the Amercan Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman on what authority he states that the Democratic Party had pledged itself to free wool?

Mr. JACKSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I did not state that, in the first place, and——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the gentleman to state it.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, the gentleman's understanding is at fault. I did state that your party had long pledged itself to free raw materials, and that, not many years ago, it had declared for free wool.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. It depends on whether I shall get more time or not.

Mr. CULLOP. Can the gentleman point to a single Democratic national platform that ever promised free raw materials? If so, will the gentleman name it? There never has been one.

Mr. MANN. Ask him if they are in favor of free raw materials.

Mr. JACKSON. Are you in favor of them now?

Mr. CULLOP. No. My party stands for a revenue tariff. I am in favor of a tariff for revenue, and you can not point to a single Democratic national platform that ever pledged the party to the doctrine of free raw materials.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to know if the gentleman from Indiana over there knows everything——

Mr. CULLOP. No. I do not claim any such distinction.

Mr. PAYNE. I mean about the Democratic Party. I did not mean any offense to the gentleman. I would like to know if the Democratic Party did not vote for free wool and stand for it? Will some one of you over there answer that, if you can? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CULLOP. I do know that no Democratic national platform ever declared for free raw materials, and you can not find it in any of them.

Mr. JACKSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of the constitutionality of this law——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman just one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. JACKSON. Just wait until I find out whether I can get more time. I have not discussed all I want to say about this proposed law. I decline to yield.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What I want to know of the gentleman is whether, when he voted for the wool bill, he expected it to become a law? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. No; I did not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is frank.

Mr. JACKSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was about to say something as to whom this law would affect. In my judgment, if it is ever held to be constitutional, being levied upon the capital and industry employed in any business in this country, it will apply to every merchant, every business man in this country who has a capital equal to $25,000, and I would like to know why you propose to take off this tax on sugar and place it upon the man who hands out the sugar to the consumers and still think that he will not put it back upon that sugar?

Why, gentlemen, the very last clause of this bill adopts the internal-revenue laws of the present time. I congratulate the Democratic Party upon extending the machinery, which was made for the purpose of collecting the tax on the illicit distilleries of the South, over the legitimate business interests of the country all over the United States; and I have no doubt that certain parts of Virginia that are at present under arms will welcome such extension of the Federal power on the part of the Democratic Party.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is a Republican county to which the gentleman refers. [Laughter.]

Mr. JACKSON. Well, it is said that there is an illicit distillery behind each pine tree in it.

Under the present corporation-tax law there was collected as penalties from the small corporations not subject to the tax at all $25 or $15 from each corporation. Does the gentleman expect the army of Federal inspectors, described here in Mr. Cabell's letter, which is included in the minority report, to go riding over the country and levy taxes of from $15 to $25 upon each firm and each individual engaged in business, under the authority of the Federal Government, and at the same time meet the approval of your southern brethren who are so jealous of the Federal Government's powers of taxation?

This law will never be held to be constitutional. It is worded almost in the identical language that was used in the act of 1894; and will the gentleman expect that the words which levied a tax upon the "income from property and rents and profits" will mean substantially anything different from the words that seek to levy a tax upon the "income of property used in business"? The courts will never say that there is any substantial difference between the two propositions. And so I say you propose to trade off $53,000,000 of Government revenue for a mere lawsuit. That is what your bill means.

Now, something was said on that side about the Republicans on this side refusing to tax the wealth of the country. But here you are face to face with the proposition that the last Congress placed a similar tax of 1 per cent upon the corporate wealth of the country, and that instead of attempting to increase that tax or to pass an inheritance tax, which would reach some of the idle wealth of the country, you have undertaken to spread this tax upon the active middle-class business men of the country. You have left all of that wealth, you have exempted under the terms of this law all of that kind of wealth which should be taxed, including the bonds and the notes that are issued by these great corporations.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] stated here that the entire wealth of the country amounted to $107,000,000,000.

I will read here from John Moody, "The Truth about the Trusts":

Thus it will be seen that including industrial, franchise, transportation, and miscellaneous about 445 active trusts are represented in the book, with a total capitalization of $20,379,162,551. They embrace in all about 8,664 original companies.

In fact, the only gigantic interests or groups which can in any sense be considered as on the same plane are the Rockefeller and Morgan groups.

The Morgan domination, like the Standard Oil, makes itself felt through the means and influence of large metropolitan financial institutions and great banks, such as the National Bank of Commerce, First National Bank, Chase National Bank, and Liberty National Bank. The great life insurance companies, such as the New York Life, and trust companies, such as the Mercantile, Guaranty, and Central Trust, are generally rated as being at least partially under the Morgan control.

It should not be supposed, however, that these two great groups of capitalists and financiers are in any real sense rivals or competitors for power, or that such a thing as "war" exists between them. For, as a matter of fact, they are not only friendly, but they are allied to each other by many close ties, and it would probably only require a little stretch of the imagination to describe them as a single great Rockefeller-

Morgan group. It is felt and recognized on every hand in Wall Street to-day that they are harmonious in nearly all particulars, and that instead of there being danger of their relations ever becoming strained it will be only a matter of a brief period when one will be more or less completely absorbed by the other, and a grand close alliance will be the natural outcome of conditions which, so far as human foresight can see, can logically have no other result.

Therefore, viewed as a whole, we find the dominating influences in the trusts to be made up of an intricate network of large and small groups of capitalists, many allied to one another by ties of more or less importance, but all being appendages to or parts of the greater groups, which are themselves dependent on and allied with the two mammoth, or Rockefeller and Morgan, groups. These two mammoth groups jointly—for as pointed out they really may be regarded as one—constitute the heart of the business and commercial life of the Nation, the others all being the arteries which permeate in a thousand ways our whole national life, making their influence felt in every home and hamlet, yet all connected with and dependent on this great central source, the influence and policy of which dominates them all.

The following statement appears in the Government's brief in the Corporation Tax case:

Two hundred and sixty-two thousand four hundred and ninety corporations made returns under the corporation-tax law. They had a capital stock of $52,371,626,752, bonded and other debt of $31,333,952,696, and a net income upon stock of $3,125,481,101. If this capitalization is substantial, they have absorbed the major part of the taxable wealth of the country.

Indeed, a writer in one of the newspapers published in this city, with more frankness than is shown by some of his fellow advocates of this bill, in predicting that it will eventually pass the Senate, says:

Advocates of the measure declare that the so-called special interests are not opposing the bill, but are perfectly willing that it should become law. They are already covered by the corporation tax, and its extension to persons may be to their advantage, if it ever becomes necessary to greatly increase taxation, as in the event of war.

It is thus seen that this law exempts by its terms the corporate wealth of the country, as well as the idle and fixed income property of the country. The vast amount of wealth amounting to more than one-third of the entire wealth of the country it is proposed to leave free of taxation, except as to taxes imposed by the last Republican Congress.

If it is a measure intended to benefit all the people, why did you not increase this corporation tax and levy a graduated inheritance tax? This would have taxed wealth and idleness and not industry alone. You could have increased the internal-revenue tax on beer and tobacco to have raised the sum needed and still the taxes on tobacco would be less than it is in England and the beer tax less than it was during the Spanish War. These taxes would have been legal, and therefore sure to be collected. But as it is you are sure of nothing.

In my humble judgment the whole law must go down as unconstitutional when it comes before the courts for trial. Of course I understand that the reputed author of this bill [Mr. HULL] argues that once a man engages in business his entire income from every source, whether from the business or from some such source as interest on United States bonds or income from real estate, will become taxable. And this is the very rock upon which the whole structure will go to pieces.

In order to arrive at once at what I wish to say, allow me to read from the Corporation Tax case what the court in its opinion said upon these words. The court said:

It is true that in the Spreckels case (192 U. S., supra) the excise tax, for the privilege of doing business, was based upon the business assets in use by the company, but this was because of the express terms of the statute which thus limited the measure of the excise. The statute now under consideration bears internal evidence that its draftsman had in mind language used in the opinion in the Spreckels case, and the measure of taxation, the income from all sources, was doubtless inserted to prevent the limitation of the measurement of the tax to the income from business assets alone.

It is evident from the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the others who have talked upon that side of this proposition that they expect that the same measurement of this tax which was applied by the Supreme Court to the measurement of a corporation income can be applied to the measurement of an individual's income; and I assert that position overlooks the fundamental proposition in the corporation-tax case, namely, that the decision rests on the right to tax the use of a corporate franchise in business. I know gentlemen quote it here as though it had rested on the proposition of taxing business alone, but they do not notice that in every instance where the court used this language it emphasizes the fact that the thing taxed is the privilege of the corporation to do business as a corporation. This is important upon the question of the measure of the tax.

It was held that the tax on a corporation might include all its income from every source, including income from property which, considered alone and unconnected with the business, would not be taxable, but the court did not hold, and never will hold, that such a rule could be applied to individuals. The court rested this ruling squarely on the very fact that all the property of a corporation must be necessarily related to and connected with its business. The Government in the brief on this case said:

Besides, the property held by a corporation, whether actively employed in its principal business or not, does serve as an aid to that business, adding to its financial strength and credit.

When the court came to pass on that question, in the opinion it used this language:

In the case at bar we have already discussed the limitations which the Constitution imposed upon the right to levy excise taxes, and it could not be said, even if the principles of the fourteenth amendment were applicable to the present case, that there is no substantial difference between the carrying on of business by the corporation taxed and the same business when conducted by a private firm or individual. The thing taxed is not the mere dealing in merchandise, in which the actual transactions may be the same, whether conducted by individuals or corporations, but the tax is laid upon the privileges which exist in conducting business with the advantages which inhere in the corporate capacity of those taxed, and which are not enjoyed by private firms or individuals. These advantages are obvious and have led to the formation of such companies in nearly all branches of trade. * * *

It is this distinctive privilege which is the subject of taxation, not the mere buying or selling or handling of goods, which may be the same, whether done by corporations or individuals.

Then on this very question the court further said:

It is contended that the measurement of the tax by the net income of the corporation or the company received by it from all sources was not only unequal, but so arbitrary and baseless as to fall outside the authority of the taxing power. But is this so? Conceding the power of Congress to tax the business activities of private corporations, including, as in this case, the privilege of carrying on business in a corporate capacity, the tax must be measured by some standard, and none can be chosen which will operate with absolute justice and equality on all corporations.

Some corporations do a large business upon a small amount of capital; others with a small business may have a large capital.

The tax upon the amount of business done might operate as unequally as a measure of excise as it is alleged the measure of income from all sources does.

Now, again:

Nor can it be justly said that investments have no real relation to the business transaction by a corporation. The possession of large assets is a business advantage of great value; it may give credit which will result in more economical business methods; it may give a standing which shall facilitate purchases; it may enable the corporation to enlarge the field of its activities and in many ways give it business standing and prestige.

So this bill incorporates in its provision a measure of taxation which, under the corporation-tax cases, is clearly unconstitutional and can not be upheld. Broadening the provisions of the corporation-tax law to include all individual incomes brings the law within the rule declared in the Pollock case and annuls it in its entirety.

In the first Employers' Liability case (207 U. S., 463) Congress used language which could be construed to include intrastate as well as interstate commerce, and intrastate commerce not being with the regulative power of Congress the entire law was declared unconstitutional. Again, in Western Union against Kansas (216 U. S., 1)—a case in which I was unfortunate enough to be on the wrong side as counsel—the court held that a State law attempting to tax all the capital stock of a foreign corporation was unconstitutional as an unlawful restriction on interstate commerce.

As this bill boldly and unequivocally attempts to measure a tax by including in its provisions sources of incomes not within the power of Congress to tax constitutionally I believe it will be stricken down by the courts as a whole.

It is also clear that when you extend the measure of tax to include all the income from every source of a man who engages in business, regardless of whether the income is received from the business, you thereby include within the letter of the law incomes from real property and invested personal property wholly unconnected with the business sought to be taxed. This penalizes or taxes the mere ownership of property and is squarely within the prohibitions declared in the income-tax cases and therefore void.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I intended to move that the committee rise at this time; but I wish to detain the committee for a moment, in order to congratulate the country on the fact that we know where the distinguished gentleman representing the Progressive Republican Party of Kansas stands on the great political issues of the day. From my association in past Congresses and in this Congress I had reason to believe that even if our progressive brethren belonging to the Republican Party had not as yet entirely approached the position taken by the Democratic Party in times past in favor of honest legislation for the American people, yet that on many questions those gentlemen who style themselves Progressive Republicans were working away from the domination of the wealth of the country and seeking legislation that would relieve the American people of many of their burdens. But the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], in addressing himself to this House on a bill which of all bills is intended to place on the wealth of this country a portion of the taxes wrung from the American people, opens his address by declaring to this House that such a bill is buncombe.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that this tax will reach, in any degree at all, the idle wealth, or the corporate interests of the country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will tell the gentleman what it means.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am going to. The gentleman's colleagues have already told him what it means. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] who preceded him in a very able speech, declared this evening that the purpose of this bill to tax the great wealth of this country was along lines that he could approve of.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes.

Mr. JACKSON. I did not understand the gentleman from Iowa to make such a statement. I understood him to say that this law was unconstitutional, in his calm judgment, and that the present Federal laws, including this one, would not compel Rockefeller to pay as much tax as a section hand. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman clearly stated that he believed that the Supreme Court of the United States would reverse the Pollock case. The gentleman from Iowa proposes to vote for this bill. He would not vote for a bill that he believed to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. But the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] proposes to cast his vote against an attempt to send a bill back to the Supreme Court, and let the highest tribunal of this land determine whether the great wealth of this country shall pay a portion of the taxes that the American people have to bear.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. I have not said I intended to vote against this bill. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has made a speech against it. The gentleman has declared that the bill is buncombe. The gentleman has declared that it is a fraud.

Mr. JACKSON. I think it is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has declared that it is unconstitutional.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I shall certainly welcome the gentleman's vote for the bill, notwithstanding that statement. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman need not be too foxy about that proposition, if he will pardon the language. I shall not vote for the bill. The responsibility is yours. I shall vote "present" upon the bill, because I believe it is unconstitutional.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. That is dodging.

Mr. JACKSON. If gentlemen will restrain their mirth——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not yield for a speech. I yielded for a question.

Mr. JACKSON. If the gentleman criticizes my position, I take it he will allow me to explain it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. I shall not vote against it, because if any part of it should ever be held constitutional I might be compelled to pay a slight tax, and I shall not cast my vote against it. I realize, as the gentleman does, that I can not prevent the passage of the bill.

And if the gentleman will say to me that the passage of this bill could in any wise procure a reversal of the Pollock case, if the gentleman will say that the bill is presented under the pretext that it is in opposition to the Pollock case and not in conformity to it, I will vote for it, because I favor an income tax, and my opposition to this bill is that it is not an income tax.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the gentleman can vote for the bill for this reason: The bill is not presented for the purpose of a reversal of the Pollock case. The bill is presented in conformity to the present decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman's colleagues on that side of the House have already said, and gentlemen on this side of the House have said, that the probability is that the present Supreme Court, presided over by a man who dissented from the Pollock case, even if it had to go so far as to reverse the Pollock case to declare this bill constitutional, the probabilities are that it would. Even the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] did not go so far as to declare this bill unconstitutional in its terms. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio limited his criticism of this bill, presenting the case of his Republican colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, to the criticism that the court, after holding it constitutional, would differentiate as to how far the bill would reach the wealth of this country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman who led off so ably in debate, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], to admit that the majority of the Ways and Means Committee have no idea that the Supreme Court would reverse the decision in the Pollock case, but rested their contention on the question as to their understanding of the corporation-tax decision to cover this tax.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Ohio knows as well as I do that there is a conflict between the Pollock case and the corporation-tax case, and the Supreme Court, instead of directly reversing the Pollock case, differentiated as between the two cases, and it may do so in this case.

Mr. JACKSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to be arguing that if the Pollock case is upheld this law must fail?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not argue that at all. I am not entering into an argument in this case now, but I simply want to congratulate the country on the fact that we have found out where the Representative of the progressive Republicans from Kansas stands. We have found, Mr. Chairman, that he does not stand anywhere. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Kansas is willing to vote for the reduction on wool; he is willing to vote for a bill reducing the duty on iron and steel, because it does not affect his constituency. But he says himself that he may be taxed under this bill, and he says himself that there are industries in his State that this bill may affect. He says himself that this may affect the enactment of a bill putting sugar on the free list, in which his State is interested, and therefore, instead of taking a stand on this bill that it is constitutional and therefore he will vote for it, or that it is unconstitutional and under his oath he will vote against it, he prefers to announce to the country that as the representative of the progressive sentiment of the Republican Party in the State of Kansas he will stand on the fence and let the procession go by on the other side without taking any part in it. [Laughter.] [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes, if the gentleman from Alabama has finished.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from New York has control of the time, and I am willing for him to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas three minutes, and that is the last three minutes I will yield to-night. [Laughter.] We are wasting time here.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama does me entirely too much honor in crediting me with being the leader of the progressives of our State. I have never assumed to be the leader of any faction or any party. But, Mr. Chairman, so far as he attributes to me an uncertainty as to where I stand, let me say to the distinguished gentleman that my tariff position is fully as well understood in the country as is that of the gentleman from Alabama. If the gentleman from Alabama would do the country the same service that he has accredited me with doing, and tell them whether he is a protectionist or free trader, he would, indeed, do the country a great service. If he would tell the country when he declared in a magazine article, which he circulated all over the country, that he was in favor of a tariff which equaled the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, whether he made that statement as a Republican or as a Democrat, he would do the country a very valuable service. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas has made so many misquotations that I am not surprised at the last one. He can not find in any article that I have ever given authority for, that ever went out under my name, where I said that I believed in a tariff that equaled the difference in the cost of the production at home and abroad. I have repeatedly said that the high-water mark of revenue tariff was the difference in cost at home and abroad, and that from that high-water mark it went downward according to the necessities of the Government. I have said that the low-water mark of the Republican tariff was above the difference between the cost at home and abroad, because they declare in favor of a reasonable profit after having fixed the difference in cost at home and abroad. That is all I have ever said, and any quotation to the contrary does not represent my views.

Mr. JACKSON. That is entirely satisfactory as far as I am concerned, and I welcome the gentleman into the Republican Party. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21214 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SHEPPARD, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS AND LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the bill may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD, and that all gentlemen who may desire to do so may have five legislative days after the passage of the bill to print remarks on the bill in the RECORD whether they speak or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD, and that all other gentlemen shall have five legislative days after the bill is passed to print remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 18, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL—HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 17681, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

As there seems to be a good deal of business accumulating before the Senate now, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask that the bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States be laid before the Senate at this time, to enable the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to speak upon it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I send to the desk, and request that it be read, the following amendment offered by myself to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina offers the amendment, or submits it for future offering?

Mr. SIMMONS. For future offering. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 5, after the word "prescribe," insert the following:

All persons over 16 years of age and physically capable of reading who can not read the English language or some other language; but an admissible immigrant or person now in or hereafter admitted to this country may bring in or send for his wife, his children under 18 years of age, and his parents or grandparents over 50 years of age, if they are otherwise admissible, whether they are so able to read or not.

That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read, the inspection officer shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on uniform pasteboard slips, each containing no less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrant in double small pica type. Each immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on a slip in such language. No two immigrants listed on the same manifest shall be tested with the same slip. An immigrant failing to read as above provided shall not be admitted, but shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him: Provided, That all persons, whether able to read the English language or some other language or not able to do so, who shall enter the United States except at the seaports thereof, or at such other place or places as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may from time to time designate, shall be adjudged to have entered the country unlawfully, and shall be deported as by law provided.

Mr. SIMMONS. Ex-President Roosevelt, Mr. President, in his various discussions of our national problems, has said that with the possible exception of the conservation of our natural resources immigration is our most important problem. While not altogether agreeing with this declaration of the ex-President, considered from the standpoint of social, political, and economic effect upon our people and our country, I do think immigration is at least one of the most important questions now confronting the American people.

Until recently, from a lack of full statistical information on the subject of immigration, most of our discussions of that subject have been largely based upon conjectures derived from the personal observation of individuals and inadequate official data and information. That difficulty does not longer exist. The abundant data and statistical information collected by the Immigration Commission during its four years' investigation, conducted not only in this country but in Europe, have supplied us with full and conclusive official information from which we may reach a reasonably accurate judgment with regard to the evils and the remedies.

In my discussion to-day I shall not undertake to cover every important aspect of the immigration question. I shall confine myself almost entirely to a discussion of the amendment, which I have just caused to be read from the Clerk's desk, providing the educational test as a means of excluding undesirable immigrants.

The educational or illiteracy test for the purpose of excluding objectionable foreigners is not a new proposition either in our public discussions or in our legislation. It has for many years been the subject of comment in the press of the country. It has received the indorsement of national party platforms. It has more than once been recommended in the messages of our Presidents. It has repeatedly been recommended by immigration officials, who are thoroughly acquainted with the needs of our immigration conditions, and it has passed one or the other branch of Congress seven or eight times.

In the Fifty-fourth Congress a proposition to apply an educational test passed both Houses. In the House the vote in favor of the bill was 195 to 20. In the Senate it was passed by the decisive vote of 52 to 10. That bill did not become a law by reason of the fact that President Cleveland vetoed it. Right here, Mr. President, I want to say that I have been informed—I do not know whether reliably so or not—that Mr. Cleveland subsequently expressed regret on account of that veto.

Again, in the Fifty-fifth Congress, a bill embodying the educational test passed the Senate by a vote of 45 to 28, and, again, in the Fifty-seventh Congress, a bill applying this test, in the form of an amendment to House bill 12191, was adopted by a vote of 87 to 7.

So it will be seen that every time this proposition has been before either branch of Congress it has been adopted, and always by a most decisive majority, sometimes five or ten to one.

Mr. President, as far back as 1896, when the evils of immigration were not so great as now, when these evils did not call as loudly for a remedy as now, the Republican national convention of that year, not in general terms, not inferentially, but in direct and specific terms, indorsed the educational test as the best and most effective method of keeping out undesirable foreigners. I want to read to the Senate this plank in the Republican platform of that year. It is as follows:

> For the protection of the quality of our American citizenship and of the wages of our workingmen against the fatal competition of low-priced labor we demand that the immigration laws be thoroughly enforced and so extended as to exclude from entrance to the United States those who can neither read nor write.

The Democratic platform of that year indorsed the principle, although it was not so specific as the Republican platform. It went to the root of the evil in so far as it affects economic conditions in this country, and that is the most acute phase of the evils of the present enormous immigration. It declared:

> We hold that the most efficient way of protecting American labor is to prevent the importation of foreign pauper labor to compete with it in the home market.

Shortly after the declaration I have read from the Republican platform, Mr. McKinley, who was elected President that year, in his inaugural address, in forceful terms declared himself in favor of the application of an intelligence test by which those who were not capable of understanding and appreciating the responsibilities and duties of American citizenship might be excluded from our shores.

In his first message to Congress in 1901 Mr. Roosevelt, in more direct terms than Mr. McKinley, dealing not with the subject generally, but dealing with the specific proposition of an illiteracy test, gave expression to his views in no uncertain terms. After discussing the subject at some length, he said:

> The second object of a proper immigration law ought to be to secure by a careful, and not merely perfunctory, educational test some intelligent capacity to appreciate American institutions and act sanely as American citizens.

In his message to Congress in December, 1902, Mr. Roosevelt reiterated his recommendation of the previous year and declared himself in favor of a certain specific amendment that he said had already passed the House of Representatives. That amendment was one introduced by Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, the present Democratic leader of the House, and which in substance and effect was identical with the amendment which I have offered and to which I am now addressing myself.

Mr. President, I need not take the time of the Senate in reading the many recommendations of the Commissioner General of Immigration upon this subject or those of Commissioner William Williams, stationed at Ellis Island, New York City, our chief immigration port, who is thrown more directly in contact with the newly arrived immigrant than anyone else in the country, for the Senate knows and the country knows how persistently the immigration officials, whose duty it is to administer our immigration laws, have advocated and recommended to Congress legislation of this character.

When the present immigration law was pending before the Senate in 1906, I offered an amendment providing for an educational test, which, with certain modifications suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and accepted by myself, was adopted by the Senate. That is the last time the Senate acted upon this subject, an investigation intervening. The amendment which I then offered, with the modifications to which I have referred, and which then passed the Senate after a brief discussion—I think no one speaking in opposition, and no vote being cast against it—I have offered again to the bill now pending before the Senate. There was never a direct vote upon that amendment in the House. I have every reason to believe that if there had been a direct vote upon it it would have passed the House with a decisive majority. Similar amendments had frequently passed the House before, but there were in that body then those who were opposed to that amendment, just as there are now, and we understand perfectly well when the opponents of legislation find themselves in a minority and unable to defeat legislation they generally resort to the device of an investigation.

So in the other House when this amendment came up it was antagonized by a proposition to substitute for it a provision for a thoroughgoing investigation, in order that we might have full information, although at that time and for more than 10 years there had been these expressions of expert opinion and of strong public sentiment for the measure, which I have recounted. That opposition resulted in the adoption of a substitute section for the illiteracy-test amendment creating the immigration commission. That commission was created specifically, therefore, and definitely for the purpose of investigating this very proposition, with a view to advising Congress as to whether it would be wise to pass such a provision as was then and is now proposed. That commission was composed of nine members—three Members of the Senate, three Members of the House, and of three civilians appointed by the President. That commission made the most exhaustive and thoroughgoing investigation of the whole immigration question that has ever been made in the history of our Government of any single legislative or administrative subject. Its investigations were begun in Europe. The members went to the very homes of those whom it is sought to exclude from our shores as undesirable. They studied them from their childhood up to the time when they arrived at manhood, investigated the means resorted to for inducing them to emigrate, ascertained the motives which lead them to come here, and looked into their qualifications for citizenship both in their native land and in this country. Then they followed them across the Atlantic Ocean, placing agents and experts in the steerage of the great steamships, in order that they might study the immigrants at close range, and when they arrived in this country they and their experts followed them into the slums of the great cities, where many of them go and remain to become hotbeds, sometimes, of anarchy and disorder. They followed them into the factories, into the coal mines, and into the railroad camps, where more than half of them go, and studied their lives, the way they live, and every fact and circumstance connected with them as laborers and as citizens.

There was expended upon this investigation the enormous sum of about $1,000,000. A large corps of experts and agents were employed to travel over the country gathering facts, and a large force of clerks were employed here at headquarters to compile the data. Probably the entire force provided and employed in connection with this investigation was as large as that of many of the bureaus in the great departments of our Government.

This investigation extended through a period of over four years. At the head of that investigation was the Commissioner of Labor and two of the leading professors of political economy in this country—one, Prof. Jenks, of Cornell University, and the other, Prof. Lauck, of Washington and Lee University, now the chief expert examiner of the Tariff Board. The results of that long and thorough investigation have been published in 42 big volumes, and Profs. Lauck and Jenks, who had so much to do with it, have written an elaborate volume, which I have here, entitled The Immigration Problem, which is nothing more than a study of the immigration problem based upon the information and the data obtained by the commission, together with their conclusions.

Mr. President, as the result of that investigation inaugurated by the Government for the specific purpose of passing upon the need for and feasibility of the educational test, we have the voluminous report of and definite findings and conclusions of that commission, composed of nine distinguished men and scholars. That report, after setting forth the facts and showing the conditions of labor generally, reaches the conclusion that there is in this country at this time a large "oversupply of unskilled labor"; it points out that the immigrants who are now coming here are largely unskilled laborers, causing a plethora in the labor markets, and concludes that "substantial restriction" is demanded by the conditions and that this present enormous immigration should be limited in the interest of the public welfare. After discussing the different methods that had been suggested for accomplishing this purpose, the commission declares:

All these methods would be effective in one way or another in securing restrictions in a greater or less degree.

But that—

A majority of the commission favor the reading and writing test as the most feasible single method of restricting undesirable immigration.

And that—

The commission as a whole recommends restriction as demanded by economic, moral, and social considerations.

Mr. President, the report says "a majority of the commission" recommends the illiteracy test as the "most feasible." That majority was eight of the nine. There was only one member of that commission who dissented from that specific finding, and he was Mr. Bennet, a Member of Congress at that time from the State of New York. I do not know, but I understand that the district he then represented was a Republican stronghold; certainly he was a Republican and a Member of the House as such. I do not know, but I have read in the House committee hearings that his attitude upon this very question was one of the leading issues in his last campaign. However that may be, the fact remains that when the election came off—I refer to the last congressional campaign—though representing a strong Republican district, Mr. Bennet was defeated by a majority of about 2,400 and a Democrat was elected in his stead, although his party associates carried the district.

That this recommendation of the commission meets with the overwhelming indorsement of public sentiment in this country is attested not only by the attitude of the press of the country but by the number of resolutions and memorials of large and powerful bodies, representing agriculture, commerce, labor, education, charity, patriotism, and the like. I do not think that there ever has been presented to the Congress a more formidable array of petitions in favor of any specific legislative proposition than has come to Congress in support of the illiteracy test. At the time that the Senate passed this amendment, in 1906, I remember distinctly there was then on file in the archives of Congress between forty-five and fifty thousand petitions in favor of this particular legislation. I have not investigated the matter, but I am told that that number of petitions probably has almost doubled by this time. I know that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that over 1,500 came in one year ago last February, when the House committee reported an illiteracy test bill. There must be in the files and in the archives of Congress at this time between 75,000 and 80,000 petitions in favor of this proposition.

Mr. President, in its effect upon the vital interests of the country, this is one of the most important public questions that has ever been before the American people—at least since I have been a Member of this body—and its importance must be my justification for taking the time of the Senate to lay before it and the country the facts in detail in so far as I can, without trespassing too much upon the patience of my associates. I want to present the facts, so that if this proposition fails again to become a law it may be understood that its failure is a sin against the light.

Probably the most potential force in our industrial life is represented by agriculture. A larger percentage of the people of this country are engaged in agriculture—over a half—than in any other line or lines of industry. So, first, I wish to present the views of the farmers of the country upon this question, and I shall be able to do so without taking up much of the time of the Senate, because they have put their views in statements before congressional committees and in resolutions which have been passed by the great conventions and congresses which they are now holding, I am glad to say, every year. There are several different farmers' organizations in this country that meet and speak for the farmers of the country. These great conventions meet each year, and in those meetings the farmers give expression to their views upon public questions. I desire to read to the Senate, first, the resolutions of the Farmers' National Congress; but before doing so I want to explain what that organization is. It is not what might be called a strictly farmers organization. It is a great national gathering in which there are representatives—farmers, students of agriculture, agricultural workers, and others interested in practical and scientific farming—are selected as delegates by agricultural bodies and by the governors of the various States and Territories from among the most prominent and influential persons representing agriculture in those States and Territories. Consequently it will be readily understood that the Farmers' National Congress represents in a broad sense the agricultural sentiment of the country, and that whatever declaration it may make about a question of public importance is entitled to confidence and respect. Here is what the last congress said:

Whereas the congressional Immigration Commission's report of 40 volumes has just been published and recommends the very measures which this organization has been advocating in its resolutions for years to judiciously restrict undesirable immigration;

Resolved, That we enthusiastically approve the commission's legislative recommendations that the head tax be increased, the illiteracy test be enacted, the foreign steamships be fined for bringing undesirables, and that other judicious measures be adopted, which are hereby urged upon the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I have here—and I propose to read it, or a part, at least—a letter addressed to me from Kendalia, W. Va., dated February 27, signed by one of the secretaries of the Farmers' National Congress, Mr. O. D. Hill, in which he says:

It was with regret that I learned S. 3175 had been reported with the illiteracy test stricken out, with no increase in the head tax provided for, and with section 31 extending the work of the division engaged in "beneficially distributing aliens."

The farmers of the country are opposed to the present kind and quantity of immigration. The subject of proper restrictions and their enforcement by means of an efficient administrative policy, such as Canada has, have been discussed every year and resolutions passed every year for some time at our annual congresses. The above farmers' organization is representative. It held its thirty-first annual session at Columbus, Ohio, last October. The meeting lasted one week, and there were over 2,000 delegates from all parts of the country present.

At that meeting the following resolution was adopted—

There he incorporates in his letter the same resolution I have just read, and goes on to say:

I see that you have offered an illiteracy test amendment to the bill S. 3175, and I am taking the liberty of writing you this letter to assure you that it meets with the approval of the Farmers' National Congress and that your efforts will be appreciated by its extensive membership.

I now present to the Senate a resolution passed last September by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union. The farmers' union is the largest and most compact farmers' organization of any time or place, and claims over 3,000,000 members. This organization has been petitioning Congress for years to enact a literacy test. I am only going to read some of the whereases of this resolution, because they state the reasons for their attitude far more forcefully and tersely than I am able to state them:

Whereas the Immigration Commission, after a four years' investigation at home and abroad, involving an expenditure of a million dollars, reports that "many undeniably undesirable persons are admitted every year"; that "there is a growing criminal element in this country, due to foreign immigration"; and that "substantial restriction is demanded by economic, moral, and social considerations"; and

Whereas that commission recommends increasing the head tax, excluding illiterate adults, requiring some visible means of support, fining the foreign steamships for bringing undesirables that could be rejected on the other side, and other measures, law in other new countries, and urged for years by this organization in its resolutions, before congressional committees, and otherwise; and

Whereas it is proposed to relieve the Northeast of its intolerable immigration evils and to continue the unloading of undesirables upon this country by diverting and distributing the incoming, ever-increasing influx from southern Europe, Asia, and northern Africa over the agricultural sections of the South and West:

Resolved, That the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America—

I desire to state right here that that is the strongest farmers' organization we have ever had in my State. I do not know whether it exists to such an extent up North. I believe the grange takes its place up there. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] indicates by a nod that that is true, but the union is the great farmers' organization of the South and West.

Resolved, That the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America in national convention assembled this 6th day of September, 1911, at Shawnee, Okla., reiterate and reaffirm our previous immigration restriction resolutions, indorse most heartily the findings and legislative recommendations of the Immigration Commission, approve of the effort of Commissioner General Keefe and Commissioner Williams to enforce the law, and earnestly urge upon Congress the enactment next winter—of an increased head tax, some such money requirement as Canada has, some such illiteracy test as is law in Australia, and other needed restrictive legislation that will check the coming of undesirables to the Atlantic as well as the Pacific slope.

This past winter—

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from North Carolina is familiar with the Australian requirements, I wish he would state what they are.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state that I am not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ought to know myself, but my work has been in other directions. Does the proposed illiteracy test require that immigrants shall speak the English language?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but to read and write——

Mr. GALLINGER. In the English language?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not the English language, but to be able to read and write in some language.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they can do so, is there any further test?

Mr. SIMMONS. That would cover the test.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would be glad to join the Senator in having such a test provided.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was very sure the Senator would. I traveled through Europe with the Senator a few years ago and happen to know his views upon many important questions.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read to the Senate a letter that I have just received from the president of the National Farmers' Union and the secretary of the union. It is dated March 15, 1912, and is addressed to myself:

Inclosed please find the statement of our committee's spokesman before the House Committee on Immigration—

They refer to Mr. Brooks, who is the head of the legislative committee of the farmers' union, located at Washington, and who a few days ago appeared before the House Committee on Immigration and made a very exhaustive and, I think, a very illuminating statement in favor of an illiteracy test amendment—

Inclosed please find the statement of our committee's spokesman before the House Committee on Immigration. We beg to call this and also Senate Document No. 251 to your attention in connection with Senate bill No. 3175, now on the Senate calendar and to be voted upon next Monday.

These two documents fully explain our interest and attitude with reference to this legislation. They show that interest and attitude to be deep-seated and of long standing. From these documents you will see that our organization and its extensive membership are unalterably opposed to section 31 of the bill extending the work of the so-called division of information, and that we have been for a number of years urging the enactment of the very legislation, such as the educational test, recently recommended by the congressional Immigration Commission.

This letter is signed, as I said, by Mr. Charles S. Barrett, the national president, and Mr. A. C. Davis, the national secretary, of the farmers' union.

Mr. President, the American Federation of Labor has spoken in no uncertain tone upon this subject. That organization, as I understand, embraces a number of other labor organizations, and is truly a federation. It is a kind of labor clearing house in its purposes and objects. Undoubtedly it is by far the most powerful labor organization in this country. For 10 years the American Federation of Labor and organized labor in general, including the railroad brotherhoods, have been petitioning Congress to enact this very illiteracy test amendment. The last resolution that I have before me passed by the American Federation of Labor is the one of 1909. It is very short and very strong:

Whereas the illiteracy test is the most practical means for restricting the present stimulated influx of cheap labor, whose competition is so ruinous to the workers already here, whether native or foreign born:

Resolved by the American Federation of Labor in twenty-ninth annual convention assembled, That we demand the enactment of the illiteracy test, the money test, an increased head tax, and the abolition of the distribution bureau.

The head of that organization, Mr. Gompers, appeared before the House committee on the 29th of February and entered into a most exhaustive, vigorous, and earnest discussion of this question. I wish the Members of the Senate would read the statement made by Mr. Gompers on that occasion, because there is no clearer, no more forceful or able presentation of this question, and it shows that on the part of labor there is a most earnest and insistent demand for this legislation, and that that demand will not down at our bidding, and that that demand can not be hushed up by such a device, as it was when this amendment passed the Senate and went to the House the last time. The issue has to be squarely met, so far as that organization is concerned.

Now, I have here a letter, received this morning, dated March 18. It is signed by the secretary of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Frank Morrison, who is well known to Senators. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to read the whole of it, and will merely say that it is a specific indorsement on the part of this general official, speaking for that organization, of the amendment I am now discussing. The letter is, in part, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1912.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that you will speak before the United States Senate on the amendment offered by yourself to the immigration bill, S. 3175, and that you will deal specifically with the subject of the restriction by means of the illiteracy test.

Thinking perhaps it may be helpful to you in your discussion, I herewith call to your attention the statement made by our legislative committeeman, Mr. Arthur E. Holder, before the House Committee on Immigration in the last Congress. His statement may be found on page 111 of the hearings before that committee, and in it Mr. Holder presented to the committee resolutions that had been adopted by the conventions of the American Federation of Labor for several years past, commencing in 1905, all of which you will find incorporated on pages 112 and 113.

It may also be advisable to say that the American Federation of Labor has gone on record in behalf of an illiteracy test practically every year at its conventions since the year 1897.

In order that you may also know the latest action of the American Federation of Labor on the subject of immigration, I hand you herewith copy of the proceedings of the thirty-first annual convention, held at Atlanta, Ga., last November (1911), on page 66 of which you will find a statement by President Gompers on the subject of immigration, showing the Immigration Commission to have completely indorsed the attitude of the American Federation of Labor upon the general subject matter of immigration, particularly that of the requirement of an educational test. On page 287 of the same report you will find the report of the committee on president's report, reaffirming former actions of the conventions of the American Federation of Labor, and instructing the legislative committee to continue their efforts to secure the passage of either the Gardner or the Burnett bill, or, for that matter, any other suitable measure providing for the educational test. This report was unanimously adopted by the convention.

Hoping that this may be of service, and with best wishes for your every success on this important question, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor.

I also present a resolution of the railroad employees, of whom there are some 400,000 in the United States, included in four great brotherhoods. This resolution is a specific declaration in favor of the illiteracy test:

Whereas we approve the restrictive recommendations made by Commissioner General Keefe in his last annual report; and

Whereas we are heartily in accord with the demand of organized labor for restriction: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in ninth biennial convention assembled at Detroit, Mich., this 2d day of June, 1910, That we urge upon Congress the enactment of the literacy test, an increased tax, a money requirement, and such other measures as will materially lessen the present enormous artificially stimulated immigration of cheap labor.

In this connection I present to the Senate a letter from Mr. H. E. Wills, joint national representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, indorsing this amendment in the most direct and specific terms. He says:

I am writing to say that the railroad organizations which I represent are deeply interested in the further limitation of the present enormous influx of labor by means of the reading and writing test proposed by your amendment and so strongly recommended by the Immigration Commission. As I brought out recently in a statement before the House Committee on Immigration, which has voted to report such a measure, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen have for a number of years discussed in their conventions and publications the need of such legislation and have passed resolutions urging it.

Mr. President, I want to put in the RECORD a few of the letters typical of those I have received from the general officers of State camps of the Patriotic Order Sons of America and from State councils of the Junior Order United American Mechanics.

The letters referred to are as follows:

Our State council believe it to be the one best restrictive measure than can be proposed, and, in the form proposed by you, will be of great benefit to the country.

Very truly, yours,

State Councilor of Vermont.

STATE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
OFFICE OF THE STATE SECRETARY,
Oak Grove, Va., March 2, 1912.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: One hundred camps of the Patriotic Order Sons of America in this State, representing over 5,000 citizens of old Virginia, heartily approve the Simmons illiteracy test amendment to the immigration bill, S. 3175, now pending, and urge its adoption.

Very truly,
F. W. ALEXANDER,
State Secretary of the Order in Virginia.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present out of order about 500 petitions and resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk, adopted during the last month by the Junior Order United American Mechanics, by farmers' unions, by the Patriotic Order Sons of America, and others. There are nearly 500 of them. These petitions came to me from 36 States, from Maine to California, from one end of the country to the other, and each of them, not in general terms but naming this particular amendment, asks for its adoption by Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be received and will lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I now present a letter, a part of which I will read, from John H. Noyes, of the national legislative committee of the Junior Order United American Mechanics. Speaking for his order he says:

I see by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that you are to speak next Monday on your illiteracy test amendment to the immigration bill, S. 3175, now pending before the Senate, and I beg to say that there are over 400,000 members of the above patriotic society that have been urging for several years with more and more emphasis the adoption of such a test for adult aliens.

The membership feels that there is quite too much illiteracy in the country already, and that we ought to require of our own, by means of compulsory school attendance laws, that they be able to read and write—as well as of foreigners entering the country—on the ground that a rudimentary education better fits one for the struggle for life and for citizenship in this country.

Mr. President, in nearly every State we are expending annually enormous sums of money to educate the boys and the girls who are to be the citizens of the future, who are to control the destiny of this country and its institutions. In many States there are compulsory-attendance laws. The taxpayers are assuming this great financial burden, they are insisting upon this higher degree of education for our boys and girls, because they appreciate and thoroughly understand the fact that in an enlightened democracy such as ours, a country where we have sovereignty citizenship, the safety of our institutions, nay, the perpetuity of those institutions, depends upon the measure of intelligence of its people.

Here, sir, we are spending annually upon our boys hundreds of millions of dollars to fit them for citizenship, because we know that that better fits them for participation in a government like ours. Yet, Mr. President, in the face of this fact, in the face of this large expenditure of money for this purpose, when the Nation as a whole comes to act we open the doors and admit every year to our citizenship between two and three hundred thousand of as densely ignorant and illiterate peoples as live under God's sun. Why should we do this? Is it not a contradiction in policy? Is it not inconsistent with our whole educational history, especially of the last 25 or 30 years?

As pertinent to this phase of the question, I now present a letter that I have just received from the vice councillor of the New York State Council of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics. He is Mr. William B. Griffith. I shall read only a portion of Mr. Griffith's letter. He says:

On behalf of some 30,000 members of the above patriotic organization in the Empire State I beg to say that the adoption of the reading test for adult aliens, as proposed by your amendment to S. 3175, will meet with universal favor, because we firmly believe that an elementary education makes our own native born better and fitter producers as well as citizens.

While the proper restriction of immigration will be opposed by the foreign steamship companies, the large employers and padrones—

Mr. President, it is this subtle opposition, this interested, this selfish, this unholy opposition, an opposition that considers not the rights nor the interests of the American citizen or of American labor, whether native or foreign born, that in the past has prevented the adoption of this legislation, in my opinion, although every vote ever taken upon it shows that both branches of Congress are overwhelmingly, and have been for 10 years overwhelmingly, in favor of it. Continuing, Mr. Griffith says:

While the proper restriction of immigration will be opposed by the foreign steamship companies, the large employers and padrones, certain importers who fear an increase in freight rates as a result of restriction, and other selfish and misguided interests and influences, the great majority of people in this State, and particularly the farmers—

Mr. President, I want to say right here that I believe the farmers of my section of the country are more opposed and more earnestly opposed to this immigration than even the laborers—laborers, and patriotic persons that are organized are not only in favor of the legislation, but are very much aroused over the laxness of our immigration laws and the feebleness of our administrative policy, as compared with those of Canada, Australia, and some other new countries.

Mr. President, I have here a similar letter from Mr. Charles H. Stees, national secretary of the Patriotic Order Sons of America. He says:

The extensive membership of the above patriotic society which has, for instance, over 100,000 active members, all voters, in my State (Pennsylvania), and has thousands in every State east of the Mississippi and in some States west of the Mississippi, are very much in favor of your illiteracy test amendment to S. 3175, and the 30,000 members in the Old North State will appreciate your efforts in behalf of that measure, which is in keeping with our public-school system and which would merely require of adult aliens coming here what our public-school system and compulsory school attendance laws exact or ought to of our own native born.

I also present a letter from the general master workman of the Knights of Labor, written to me from Washington, dated March 15, 1912. He says:

As you know, the order of the Knights of Labor has long favored the exclusion of undesirable immigrants, and as a means of doing so has also favored the illiteracy test and still continues to favor such a policy. We hope that you will be successful in securing the passage of your amendment to the Dillingham bill as it now stands—the illiteracy test having been stricken out by the committee. We think this is one of the most important measures to be considered by this Congress—the exclusion of undesirables by the illiteracy test as recommended by the Immigration Commission.

Mr. President, it is well known that, beginning in the year 1905 and extending to 1906, 1907, and 1908, there were held in various parts of the South pro-immigration conventions, so-called. They were generally gotten up by people interested in transportation, in land schemes and development projects. But notwithstanding the purpose for which those gatherings were called, every single one of them, I believe, because of the strong sentiment in the South upon the question, passed resolutions demanding effective restrictions, and some of them specifically declaring for the illiteracy test.

The first meeting was known as the "Alabama immigration conference," and was held at Birmingham, June 13, 1905. It adopted a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That we express to the Representatives in the Federal Congress from this State our earnest desire that they support any reasonable measure looking to the elevation of the standard of foreign immigration, to the end that criminals, paupers, and illiterates be excluded.

That conference, I repeat, was called for boosting immigration. The transportation and real estate interests were there in full force.

Then came the famous Chattanooga conference on immigration and quarantine. It was a similar gathering, but it indorsed President Roosevelt's messages recommending an economic test and the educational or "literacy" test.

There was a similar outcome to the Nashville conference of November, 1907. There was also one at Tampa, Fla., where a convention of various persons from many States and representing different societies, commercial clubs, unions, associations, corporations, railroads, and the like, met February 13, 1908, and a number of resolutions were adopted, among which will be found the following:

Resolved, That the several States carefully consider the question of foreign immigration as a national question, and that our Representatives in Congress be asked to urge upon Congress the enactment of such Federal legislation as will effectively stem the tide of undesirable immigration now pouring into this country.

The last public meeting of this kind held in the South was year before last, and was held at Jackson, Miss. That convention, having a large representation from the different States of the South, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That this convention does hereby respectfully memorialize Congress to pass legislation restricting the present alien influx of ignorant, thriftless, and undesirable people now pouring into the United States from southern Europe and western Asia.

Mr. President, the chief opposition to legislation carrying out the recommendations of the commission comes from those selfishly interested in maintaining and increasing this foreign influx, chiefly the foreign steamship companies and the railroad companies which profit in hauling them in their ceaseless migrations to and from our shores and certain manufacturers and miners who are interested in securing cheaper labor than the American standard of living will allow.

Yet, Mr. President, in the face of this recommendation of the immigration commission, made after four years of exhaustive investigation at an expense to the people of a million dollars, and made for the express purpose of determining whether conditions require an illiteracy test, in the face of this overwhelming demand coming from the great economic, industrial, and patriotic forces of the country, with practically no opposition except that prompted by selfishness, the Committee on Immigration have reported to the Senate a bill which confines itself to another codification of our present immigration laws, with the addition of a few amendments to the administrative features of our present utterly inadequate and ineffective immigration laws.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator would not like to do injustice to the Senate Committee on Immigration. He knows, of course, that the members of that committee who were also members of the immigration commission are heartily in favor of the retention in the bill of the educational test, and of the other members of that committee I suppose it is true that they also favor it. There were those who thought that the retention of that provision in the bill would endanger its passage, and there are administrative features of the bill which are so important that they thought it would be better to drop this particular feature from the bill and present it as an independent measure, which has been done by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

I did not want the impression to go out from the Senator's remarks that the Senate committee, as a committee, are opposed necessarily or as a whole, at least, to this feature of the bill, and I did not want anyone to think that I am opposed to it, because I put it into the original bill and I favor it now. I shall be glad to cooperate with the Senator from North Carolina in all his efforts to retain it in the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the gist of the whole inquiry and the crux of the findings and recommendations of the commission appointed to investigate this whole question was the recommendation that the evil of which the country was complaining could be best remedied by an educational test. Yet, Mr. President, when that committee acted upon this great public question—and there was no necessity for action except in accordance with the recommendations of the commission, the action growing out of that inquiry and out of the recommendations of the commission—we have a bill without that important provision.

The Senator from Vermont says that it was left out because the committee thought it might endanger the passage of the bill. Why should the committee think that it would defeat the bill when this identical proposition has passed one or the other branches of Congress seven or eight times and that it has never failed to receive a majority of from two-thirds to three-fourths of the vote in either branch of Congress?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I hope the Senator from North Carolina does not think that I was afraid personally.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator's personal position in the matter.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I want it distinctly understood also that there was introduced contemporaneously with the report of the committee upon this question an independent bill providing for the educational test in the admission of all European immigrants.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when—when, I say—that independent bill comes up we shall find these selfish interests about which I have spoken—the steamship companies and the employers of cheap labor in the mines, in the factories, and on the railroads—arrayed against it. Why not put it in this bill? It would be the strongest single provision in the bill. More people in the United States have declared themselves in favor of this specific provision, which the committee has left out because, as the Senator explains, they were afraid it might imperil the passage of the bill—more people in this country are interested in it and more people are demanding its passage than are interested in any other or all the other features of that bill. So far from weighting down or endangering that bill, this provision would have immensely strengthened it.

Mr. President, this legislation, in my judgment, can not be postponed any longer by legerdemain or device of one character or another. The time has come when it has got to be met squarely. When the Senate passed an amendment identical with this amendment, without a dissenting vote recorded against it, six years ago, and it went over to the other House, there they said, "Oh, we must have further investigation," and an investigation was, by a narrow majority, substituted for it. It has been charged that that was nothing but a pretext and a device to prevent it from coming to a vote, because they knew that if it came to a direct vote it would be passed by an overwhelming majority and would go to the President, and that he dared not veto it. So, Mr. President, the enemies of this legislation sought to defeat it indirectly, knowing they could not do so directly; and by processes, familiar to the country, but which I, for parliamentary reasons, am not permitted to speak of more in detail here, they were able to prevent an expression of the will in the popular branch of the Government upon this vital question and to get this investigation substituted for it.

Now, after we have had this commission, costing a million dollars, its findings and its facts filling 42 volumes and extending over a period of four years, boiling down the result of all these four years of labor in this one specific finding, when the report of the commission is made the Committee on Immigration contents itself with reporting a bill making modifications and administrative changes in the present law, and when asked the reason for this omission they tell us that they did not put the illiteracy test in the bill because they were afraid it might weight it down. Weight it down, indeed! Has it ever failed when put to a vote in either branch of Congress? When did it become so weak as to justify these fears of the committee? Strong as it was before, it is now buttressed by the indorsement of this great commission, three of whose members are also members of the Senate Committee on Immigration. I do not say that this is a device, but I say that it is not dealing with this question bravely and squarely. Therefore I shall, when the bill reported by the committee comes up, urge the adoption of the amendment which I have introduced, and take no chances of action upon it as a separate measure.

Mr. President, if we were dealing with immigration conditions in this country prior to 1880, our present law and the amendments now proposed by the committee's bill to that law would be all that was needed, but, Mr. President, in the last 25 or 30 years the character of our immigration has not only entirely changed but has also been accompanied by a terrific increase in quantity, and that change and increase have created new conditions, brought about new problems, and the restrictions which existing laws provide and which the bill under consideration proposes do not reach the root of the evil evolved out of these changed conditions.

From 1819 to 1882 immigration to this country was practically unrestricted. None was needed.

As late as 1880, 64.5 per cent of the immigrants to this country came from northern and western Europe. They came chiefly from England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark.

They were an intelligent, sturdy, industrious, and thrifty people. The rate of illiteracy among them was less than half that which to-day obtains in this country. They represented the best and the hardiest element of the nationalities from which they came. They were not adventurers, but men who sought better conditions and higher opportunities under more liberal institutions and laws. They were in large part descendants of the same stock of people who originally settled this country.

The governments under which they had been reared, while monarchical in form, were in substance in the main representative.

By heredity and training they understood the principles of freedom and of government by the people. They were fitted to become good citizens of the Republic. Those of them who did not speak our language quickly learned to speak it. They came with the purpose of finding and making a permanent home for themselves and their children. They readily adjusted themselves to our habits and customs, threw off and dismissed forever all thought of their old allegiance, came under our flag, fell in love with our institutions, mingled and intermarried with our people, and were rapidly assimilated and Americanized.

In 1869, of the entire immigration to this country only nine-tenths of 1 per cent came from southern and eastern Europe. In the year 1880 only 8.5 per cent of the entire immigration to this country came that section of Europe.

The few who came during this period from southern and eastern Europe were representatives of the best element of their nationalities. They came as bona fide citizens, with the purpose of becoming permanent citizens of the Republic, and soon became Americanized in habits and customs, thought, and aspirations.

Mr. President, those conditions have changed. I can not better describe that change than to read from the book to which I have referred, written by Messrs. Jenks and Lauck, members of the Immigration Commission. At page 24 these authors say:

> During the last 25 to 30 years so marked is the change in the type of immigrants that it is convenient to classify our immigration as the old, that is, the immigrants coming before 1883, and the new, namely, those coming since that date. The former class includes primarily immigrants from England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland. These countries furnished some 95 per cent of the total number of immigrants coming into this country before 1883. From 1883 to 1907, 81 per cent—

Nearly reversing the figures.

> 81 per cent of the total number of European immigrants came from Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, Greece, Italy, Montenegro, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Servia, Spain, Syria, and Turkey.

Total European immigration (including Syrians) to the United States in years specified by class of immigrants.

Class.	Year.		Per cent of total immigration.
	1882	1907	1882	1907
Old immigration	563,170	227,851	87.1	19.0
New immigration	83,320	971,608	12.9	81.0
Not specified	274	107	.....	.....
Total	646,764	1,199,566	.....	.....

The percentage of illiteracy among the old immigrants, that is, those who antedated 1883, was only 2.7 per cent, far below that of our native population. The rate of illiteracy among the new immigrants, that which has been coming here since 1883, is on an average about 36 per cent, and the bulk of this immigration, the most undesirable portion of it, is of a much higher degree of illiteracy than the general average. Of the 1,500,000 south Italians that came to America from 1899 to 1909, over 800,000, or 54 per cent, could neither read nor write; 54 per cent of the Syrians who came during that period could neither read nor write; 35 per cent of the Poles who came during that period could neither read nor write; 68 per cent of the Portuguese; 38 per cent of the Ruthenians; 51 per cent of the Russians; 58 per cent of the Turks; 27 per cent of the Greeks, and 41 per cent of the Bulgarians and Servians and Montenegrins could neither read nor write. In short, Mr. President, something over three-fourths of this entire new immigration is made up of a people the large part of whom are densely ignorant and illiterate.

But this is not the worst. They are people who have grown up under surroundings which unfit them for the responsibilities of citizenship in a country like ours, where the people rule, and where every man is a sovereign. They have learned nothing of the duties and responsibilities of citizenship from early study and training, and their environment from youth in their native country has been such that they have learned nothing from contact or by absorption. They represent a different civilization from ours; they come, as I said before, from the backward nations of the world; they know nothing of freedom or its responsibilities and its blessings, and they are incapable of learning or understanding them. Assimilation would be a difficult task if they came to stay. But they come not to make their home here and to cast their lot with us, like the old immigrant settlers did, but to gather up the fragments and crumbs that fall from the overflowing table of our prosperity. Mr. President, fully 40 per cent of those who now come, according to the report of the Immigration Commission, remain only a short time and soon return to their homes, with whatever they can save. As a matter of fact, a much larger percentage, if you take the figures of the last census, go back because that census shows——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not know that I understood the Senator. What did he say was the percentage of those who returned?

Mr. SIMMONS. According to the report of the Immigration Commission, it is 40 per cent.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. My recollection is that the percentage is substantially one-third of all, but that among certain nationalities it runs above that. However, I am only speaking from recollection.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Immigration Commission's report states that at least 40 per cent of those coming to this country return. The census figures for the decade ending with 1910 show that a much larger per cent must return, because while during those 10 years there arrived in this country about 9,787,000 aliens, the census report shows that during that time the increase in the foreign-born population of this country was only a little over 3,000,000, so that something in the neighborhood of half or more than half of those who came, if those figures be true, must have returned.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator is substantially correct in what he is saying, but I would remind him that until the act of 1907 there was no law requiring the steamship companies to keep a record of the returning immigrants. The figures down to that time were based upon estimates, but it was thought that about one-third of the total number of immigrants returned. In the last two or three years records have been kept, and the number of returning immigrants has varied according to industrial conditions in this country. After the panic of 1907, I think there were more aliens leaving this country than there were admitted for a considerable length of time; but I presume the average which the Senator has stated is correct, that, taking it altogether, perhaps 40 per cent of them have returned.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is certainly true that the average is a little larger than would appear from the report of the steamship companies.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That average has been raised from substantially 33 per cent, undoubtedly, through the great exodus there was after the panic of 1907.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is true—about 70 per cent returned that year. Now, Mr. President, the question naturally arises in the analysis of this immigration situation, by whom and how are these people brought here, and for what purpose are they brought here—I mean this ignorant mass that comes every year from the southern and the eastern shores of Europe and the western part of Asia? They do not come here upon their own initiative. The bulk of those who are brought here do not know anything about the United States. Generally speaking, they know nothing about any place in the United States, except the place where they are tagged for.

I need not stop here, I think, to enter into a discussion of the methods by which these people are corraled, so to speak, and brought here. The methods are familiar to the country; they are methods that are in violation of the spirit if not the letter of our immigration laws, and in many instances violate the laws of the emigrant country. They are secret, clandestine methods, and the responsibility for them largely rests upon the steamship transportation companies with the connivance of certain great railway systems and the people who employ them after they are brought here.

These steamship companies have thousands of agents. I am told that in some foreign countries they are found everywhere. They are the people who control and direct this mass of illiterates whom they can most easily take advantage of. It is not necessary that I should go into a discussion of those methods. They are too well understood. The Immigration Commission in its report and the annual reports of the Bureau of Immigration repeatedly call attention to them. In answer to my inquiry, "Who brings these people here and for whom and for what purpose are they brought here?" I desire to call attention to a statement by the Commissioner General of Immigration in his last annual report:

SOURCES OF AND INDUCEMENTS TO IMMIGRATION.

Considerable space has been devoted in previous reports to this important and interesting subject. It has been shown that (1) the sources of our immigration have undergone a decided change in recent years, one which is of great significance to the country and its people, and (2) much of the immigration which we now receive is artificial, in that it is induced or stimulated and encouraged by persons and corporations whose principal interest is to increase the steerage-passenger business of their lines, to introduce into the United States an overabundant and therefore cheap supply of common labor, or to exploit the poor ignorant immigrant to their own advantage by loaning him money at usurious rates; or, as now so frequently happens, in the organized and systematized state of the business, a combination of the three elements, so that money lenders and ticket agents abroad, the transportation companies, and the labor brokers and large employers of common labor here each receive their portion of the benefits and proceeds.

I want also, for the same purpose, to read a statement of Marcus Braun, who was sent abroad a few years ago to investigate and report upon the question of artificially stimulated immigration. He says:

I found a condition of things which convinced me beyond any doubt that some European Governments, agencies, and private individuals are continuing to regard this country as the dumping ground for thousands of their undesirable people. These conditions, coupled with the arrogant and widespread assumption that this country is but an asset of a large number of Europeans, subject only to their desires and orders, is such that if universally known in this country would drive the blood of humiliation into the face of every good American, and a description of which would defy the pen of a Macaulay.

Mr. Braun in his report also tells of seeing tons of literature and other evidence in southeast Europe, showing the efforts that were being made by the steamship companies through their agents and subagents to stimulate emigration to the United States.

Mr. President, I have no sectional or race prejudice in this matter. I have nothing to say but what is good of the people as a whole—of Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and so forth. Many of the immigrants coming here from these countries make good citizens and are desirable, but a large part of them—that part which I would exclude and which, I think, this amendment will exclude—are not representative of the people of the countries from which they come. They are a class who would never come to this country but for the methods employed to bring them here. Representative people of these races are not the kind of people that the agencies who are stimulating immigration to this country want. Representative people of these races could not be induced to come by the methods that are successful in getting this undesirable class to come, nor would they answer the purposes for which they are brought here, namely, to furnish cheap labor for our mines, factories, and the railroads.

Now, Mr. President, for whom are these people being brought here? Who employs them when they come? The steamship companies know for whom they are bringing them here. They know who wants them, and the people who employ this class of labor know that it comes here virtually in violation of our immigration laws. The Immigration Commission says from one-third to a half of them come with their passage paid.

Where do these people go to find employment? The old immigration went to the farms. The new does not go to the rural districts, and will not stay when taken or put there. The book by Mr. Jenks and Mr. Lauck, from which I quoted before, under the head of "Occupation of European immigrants," shows that of the immigrants to the United States from 1899 to 1909 only 23 per cent were farm laborers, 36 per cent were common laborers—designated so—21 per cent had no occupation at all, making 80 per cent of the immigration during that period seek employment largely not upon the farms, but, as I shall show hereafter—excepting those who settle in the slums of our great cities—in the mines, factories, railroads, and sweatshops of the country.

I have here a table showing the occupations of immigrants coming to this country during 1911. That year 1,030,300 aliens entered, and of that enormous number only 13,496 were farmers; 160,000 were farm laborers in their own country, but they did not seek farm employment here; 175,000 were common laborers, 122,000 were servants, 246,000 had no occupation at all, making in that year 735,000, or three-fourths of the entire immigration, who found their homes either in the slums of the great cities or were employed, as I have indicated, not upon the farms but in the industries of the country in congested centers.

I wish to present a statement made by the Commissioner General of Immigration as to the occupation of these immigrants after coming here. It is from page 29 of his last annual report, where he states:

A large proportion of the southern and eastern European immigration of the past 25 years has entered the manufacturing and mining industries of the Eastern and Middle Western States, mostly in the capacity of unskilled laborers. There is no basic industry in which they are not largely represented, and in many cases they compose more than 50 per cent of the total number of persons employed in such industries.

In this same connection I want to read to the Senate a statement by the chairman of the House Committee on Immigration, the Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT, who said in the course of the recent hearings before the House committee upon this subject:

Mr. BURNETT. I was talking last year to a coal operator in Alabama, and I said: "Whom do you work?" He said, "Welsh, Americans, Negroes, South Italians, and English." I said, "What is the sorriest labor you have?" He said, "The South Italians." I said, "Worse than the Negroes?" He answered, "Yes." I said, "What do you want with them, then?" He said, "For the purpose of keeping down the price of wages." The operators and owners of mines and other great industrial institutions are the ones who are keeping agents in New York to employ this low-class labor.

Mr. President, I wish to present here a statement made by Mr. Joseph J. Ettor, taken from the Haverhill (Mass.) Evening Gazette of January 23, 1912, in regard to the strike and strikers at Lawrence, which is as follows:

In portions of Syria, Galilea, and Russia people know only Lawrence, United States. Who told them? The agents of the textile industry. * * * They have cards with a picture of a mill and a house—a real mansion—with the people heading from the mill to the house, and then a bank with workers with big pay bags. Yet 75 per cent of the textile workers in Lawrence would not know a $20 bill if they should meet one coming down the street.

The conditions which exist in Lawrence, Mass., illustrate the truth of my statement that these people are being brought here in the interest of American manufacturers to take the place of our American laborers, because they can live cheaper, and therefore can afford to work cheaper and do work cheaper.

I have here an article, written by Mr. Lauck, of the Immigration Commission, which appeared in the February issue of the Survey, a New York magazine, discussing the Lawrence strike, which is as follows:

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE SITUATION AT LAWRENCE—THE CONDITION OF THE NEW ENGLAND WOOLEN-MILL OPERATIVE.

[By W. J. Lauck, formerly in charge of the industrial investigations of the United States Immigration Commission.]

The labor dispute at Lawrence, Mass., affords an instructive insight into existing industrial conditions. Probably the most significant feature of the situation has been the attitude displayed by the southern and eastern European wage earners. Strange to say, the disturbance at Lawrence has been mainly due to their protest against a curtailment by legal enactment of the weekly hours of labor, under the impression that it would lead to a decline in their weekly earnings. In other words, they have resisted an improvement in conditions of employment because of their lack of permanent interest in the industry in which they are engaged.

The Lawrence labor troubles have also been of unusual interest for the reason that the industry around which they have centered is one of the chief beneficiaries of our protective system. The argument has long been made that the woolen and worsted goods manufacturing industry needed a high tariff in order to protect its wage earners from the products of the pauper labor of Europe. The recent development at Lawrence, however, has disclosed the fact that the so-called American wage earner, whose standard of living, it is claimed, must be upheld by the tariff, is largely a myth, and that in reality the American woolen-mill operatives are made up of "pauper workmen" of almost half a hundred of the immigrant races from the south and east of Europe and from Asia.

As a matter of fact, the term American wage earner is a misnomer, and in no industrial locality is this better illustrated than in Lawrence, the principal center of our worsted-goods mills. * * *

The numerical importance of the Polish, Portuguese, Italian, Syrian, Armenian, and Lithuanian races, all of recent arrival in the United States, is in strong contrast to racial conditions of a generation back.

* * * * * * * * *

The racial composition of Lawrence and the racial displacements which have occurred in the worsted and woolen mills there are typical of other woolen goods manufacturing centers in New England. This has recently been disclosed by the United States Immigration Commission and the Tariff Board.

Only about one-eighth of the woolen and worsted mill operatives at the present time are native Americans. Slightly more than three-fifths are foreign born, chiefly recent immigrants from southern and eastern Europe. The remainder are the native-born children of parents who were born abroad. During the past 20 years the American and the British and northern European immigrants have been rapidly leaving the mills, owing to the pressure of the competition of the recent immigrant. The south Italian, Polish, and north Italian are the three principal races of southern and eastern Europe engaged in the industry, while the English, Irish, and German of the races of past immigration are represented in the largest numbers.

Of the foreign-born employees about one-fifth of the males and two-fifths of the females have had experience in the same kind of work before coming to this country, while two-fifths of the male employees and one-third of the female have been farmers or farm laborers in their native countries. The average weekly wage of the male operatives 18 years of age or over is only $10.49, and of the female employees $8.18. The average annual earnings of male heads of families employed in the industry are only $400, and of all males 18 years of age or over $346.

* * * * * * * *

The effect of these low earnings is shown in the bad living conditions and the high degree of congestion which prevails in the households of the operatives. * * *

Very little political or civic interest is manifested by the southern and eastern Europeans. Only 3 out of every 10 males eligible to citizenship have taken out naturalization papers.

* * * * * * * *

Such are the conditions out of which have grown the recent disturbances in Lawrence. They are distinctly at variance with the claim that unrestricted immigration is an advantage and a protective tariff a necessity to the American wage earner.

I want to say, in passing, that Lawrence is typical of many of the industrial towns that have grown up as the fruit of the liberality of our present immigration laws. It is a foreign city on American soil. There are 85,000 inhabitants in the mill town of Lawrence, and less than 12,000 of them are Americans. It is a great industrial town. It is a center for the manufacture of woolens and worsteds. There are employed, I believe, in this industry in that town something like 30,000 people.

Mr. President, 92 per cent of them are foreign born, and that part coming from southeastern Europe does not live in the American quarters of that city. They live segregated, in colonies. They have practically no contact or association with our people. They cling to the habits of their old countries. They do not speak our language. Fifty per cent of them can neither read nor write in any language.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator has fallen into a little inaccuracy as to the degree of illiteracy existing in the city of Lawrence.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not speaking of the degree of illiteracy in the city of Lawrence. I was speaking of the degree existing among the recently arrived immigrants employed in the textile mills there.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The report of the commission, page 515, volume 1, gives the number of Irish in that city, and those are American Irish, as 21,000; and the Irish race reads and writes, as the Senator knows. I think only 2.7 per cent are illiterate. With the English, of whom there are 9,000, the percentage of illiteracy is only 1.1 per cent. Among the Scotch seven-tenths of 1 per cent are illiterate, and there are 2,300 of them in Lawrence. Of French Canadians there are 12,000. I do not remember the percentage. Of Germans there are in Lawrence 6,500, and only 5.1 per cent ordinarily are illiterate. Then there are 12,000 Americans.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not speaking of that class.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That would make about 62,000 out of the 85,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Vermont do me the favor, inasmuch as he has before him the report of the commission, to read the statement as to the number of Italians there?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Of the Polish there are 2,100.

Mr. SIMMONS. How many of them are illiterate?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Thirty-five and four-tenths per cent are illiterate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Of the Portuguese there are only 700 in the city, and of those—that is, the Portuguese as a rule; I am not speaking of the Portuguese in the city of Lawrence—68.2 per cent——

Mr. SIMMONS. Are illiterate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Wait just a moment, Senator. I am speaking of our experience in receiving European immigrants during the last 20 years. In those years 68 per cent of the Portuguese have been illiterate. Of Hebrews there are 2,500 in Lawrence, and the general percentage of illiteracy is 25.7. Of Italians there are in Lawrence 8,000, and of those we may expect to find, as the Senator has said, 54.2 per cent illiterate. Of the Syrians there are 2,700 in Lawrence, and their percentage of illiteracy is 54.1. Of the Armenians there are a smaller number, 600, in Lawrence, and 24.1 per cent of them are supposed to be illiterate. Of Lithuanians there are 3,000 in Lawrence, with 48.8 per cent illiterate.

That furnishes a very good illustration of what the provisions of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina would do in reducing the number of aliens coming to this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was referring, when giving the figures as to illiteracy, to the new immigration from southern and eastern Europe, who constitute the bulk of the unskilled laborers in these mills. Of course I was not referring to that from northern Europe.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad the Senator from Vermont has put in the statistics for the city of Lawrence——

Mr. SIMMONS. So am I.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because the Senator from North Carolina made a pretty broad statement, which would——

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably my statement was not understood by the Senator from New Hampshire as being limited, as I intended it to be, to immigrants from the countries of southeastern Europe. As understood by the Senator the statement would be, as he says, too broad.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator made it too broad.

Mr. SIMMONS. As a general statement it would be; but I meant to limit it as stated before.

Mr. GALLINGER. We must give credit to those to whom credit is due. The mill owners of Lawrence, at their own expense, are conducting night schools to educate these people to higher points. I am with the Senator from North Carolina, so far as being for a test, either in this bill or some other bill, but Senators should not make statements so broad that the facts will not sustain them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose the Senate understood perfectly well that in discussing illiteracy I have been talking all the time of immigration from southern and eastern Europe. I think I have stated before that the immigrants from northern Europe are highly educated; less than 3 per cent are illiterate; and, of course, my remarks in that respect should have been taken in connection with what I have been stating.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right in that view, but I think if he will examine what he has said he will correct it to some extent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I will, if necessary.

Mr. President, I have here a statement about the situation in Lawrence that I want to put into the RECORD. It is from the North American. It seems that the North American sent some one down there to investigate the conditions. The writer says:

Under the plea that the standard of living in the United States is higher than in any other country in the world, that the class of labor itself is better and that therefore greater wages must be paid, the manufacturers of textile products have succeeded for many years in buttressing themselves about with a tariff that is not only protective but exorbitant.

They have held the threat over the country that should the tariff be made lower the present high standard of living made possible by the lucrative wages now being paid must be lowered also. Quite a reverse picture is revealed by the situation at Lawrence.

We find upon investigation that the textile manufacturers have at these mills as squalid labor as can be found in the four corners of the earth. They pared down the wages of these people, not to meet the standard of living in the United States, but to the barest possible margin of existence.

In one miserable tenement building I found 54 persons living. Twenty-two of them worked in the mills at an average pay of $6.67 per week. This is $2.75 per week with which to buy food, clothes, light and fuel, and pay rent for each one of the 54. These are luxuries which the mill laborers enjoy under the rich picking of a high protective tariff.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. But I do not desire to make a tariff speech. I am making an immigration speech. If the Senator objects to that I will leave it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not object to a tariff discussion either.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not intend to get into a tariff discussion.

Mr. GALLINGER. That will be thrashed out later on. But when the North American says they sent an agent there who discovered these conditions——

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say the North American sent an agent; I said I assumed they had sent an agent, from the character of the article.

Mr. GALLINGER. If he means they are working at $6.50 a week, it is not true. We all know the North American wants to have a sensation regularly once a day. I think the fact is that they gathered about such information as the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] says the agents of the Department of Commerce and Labor reported from your own State. There are exaggerations floating around about these matters that the facts will not justify. They are paying, and have been paying, a little higher wage at Lawrence than in some other of the industrial cities of the country, as I can readily show; and there is no reason why those people should live in the way they do. They live in that way and accumulate their money, as the Senator has said, and take it away to southern Europe after a while. If they do that it is their own fault.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, of course the article I read did not pretend to give the average rate of wages, but it said the rate of wages of the particular household described. I judge, from their being crowded into such close quarters, the household described did not represent high-class laborers.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Mr. Lauck, who was a member of the Immigration Commission and is now the chief examiner of the Tariff Board, in his article which I have just read, gives the average wage paid to the unskilled and skilled laborers in the factories of Lawrence. The average weekly wage of the operatives 18 years of age or over is $10.49; and for females, $8.18. That is the average, and, of course, a considerable number receive a much lower wage.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is higher pay, perhaps——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not so much higher. The Senator is speaking of an average, and there must be some who receive more and some who receive less than the average.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says that $10 is not much higher than the statement he made?

Mr. SIMMONS. The average is two or three dollars higher.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a good deal higher than $6.

Mr. SIMMONS. The case referred to by the North American is below the average given by Mr. Lauck. It is shown from the context that it is somewhat exceptional.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. Would the Senator be willing to state the wage paid in the textile industries in his own State?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not investigated the wage rate in the textile industries of my State, and regret I am unable to state the average. These people are not employed there. We have few foreigners in North Carolina. As I said, I am not making a tariff speech; I am making an immigration speech; and naturally I went to the sections and the industries in which foreigners are employed to investigate the conditions. I do not think that the wages in dollars and cents in the cotton mills of the South or New England are high.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are not much higher than in Lawrence.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think they are higher. The money wages may not be much higher, but the real wages are. I will say to the Senator that I think they are much higher relatively, because around nearly every cotton mill in the South there is a little mill-town village; rents are low, and each house has about it a garden, wherein they raise their vegetables; they have their chickens, their eggs, their cow; they get their wood, fuel, and other necessaries cheaper; and consequently their net returns are much greater.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, that the mill operatives in the Senator's States are so prosperous. When it comes to the matter of wages they are not any higher than in the industrial centers of the North, and in addition to that they work longer hours than they do in the North.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should challenge the statement about their working longer hours, but I have not the data before me, and I do not care to enter into that discussion. I would suggest also that their work is not so intensive.

Now, Mr. President, in the Haverhill Gazette, of Massachusetts, there was published an article that I am going to read. It is set out in the hearings before the House committee in the testimony of Mr. Brooks, of the farmers' union, who quotes in his statement what I shall read. I read only two paragraphs of it. After describing the conditions at Lawrence, the article says:

> Worse than all else, the central figures in this whirlwind, the men and women who are fighting for what they claim to be their rights, are people who but yesterday were herding like cattle under another sun and sky—races with which the English-speaking people have never hitherto assimilated and who are most alien to the great body of people of the United States. They are illiterates, cheap, low-class labor, taking not only lower wages, but accepting a standard of life and living so low that the American workingman can not compete with it.
> Thousands of the strikers know nothing of the language or the land in which they live. To these men and women the customs and the characteristics of American people and American institutions are an unknown quantity. They have come in by shiploads from the dark and forbidding byways of Italy, Russia, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Poland, Greece—anywhere and everywhere that the industrial procurers could plant their alluring banners in defiance to all the laws of God and man.

Mr. President, the same thing is true about the railroads. In this book to which I have referred so repeatedly to-day, on page 167, speaking about railroads and construction work, it is said.

> Disregarding geographical considerations, it may be said in general that foreign-born wage earners constitute slightly more than three-fourths of the entire number of persons now engaged in railway and other construction work.

Referring to the earning capacity of the foreign employees on railroad and construction work, page 169, I find the following statement, which I will read for the benefit of the Senator from New Hampshire:

> A study of more than 5,000 wage earners in all sections of the country showed that the average daily earnings of native white Americans were $2.43 and of immigrants $1.68. The highest average daily earnings of any race of southern and eastern Europe were shown by the north Italians, the members of this race earning on an average $1.86 each day, while no other recent immigrants had average daily earnings in excess of $1.59.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator what is the book?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the work of W. Jett Lauck and Jeremiah W. Jenks, entitled "The Immigration Problem."

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the matter of wages that the Senator is speaking of, is it not a fact that the women who are working in those mills in Lawrence and other places, who come from Armenia and other sections of southern Europe, are to-day receiving a weekly wage for their labor very far in excess of what women are receiving who are clerks in the great department stores in the city of Washington—women who have been educated, who have graduated from our public schools and our high schools, and are of as good families as we have in the whole city?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not investigated that particular question. No doubt the "oversupply" of labor reported by the commission as due to unrestricted immigration affects other occupations, as the commission points out.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think they receive from six to eight dollars a week here.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is an entirely different class of work. In Washington, I suppose, there are many applicants for positions of this kind, due to peculiar and well-known conditions in the Capital City.

Mr. McCUMBER. And they receive about $9 a week on an average in Lawrence, as I have looked over the figures.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be very glad, if the Senator has the amount paid clerks in the department stores of this city, to incorporate it in my remarks. I have heard they are excessively low. I do not think, however, the two propositions are analogous.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to suggest to the Senator that I think they are scarcely in a position to make any complaint when they are receiving a greater wage than is received by educated women in this city.

Mr. SIMMONS. When the Senator says they are not in a position to complain, does he mean the laborers or the clerks in the city of Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean those who come here from foreign countries.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know, as I said before, what the women employees in the department stores of Washington are receiving. I have heard it is low. That is due partly, at least, to the fact that conditions here are somewhat exceptional and that there is, on account of these conditions, a greater oversupply of this class of job seekers than in some other cities. But the argument that the laborers in the factories and mines that I have been talking about should not complain when they get as much or a little more than is paid women and girls in the department stores of Washington does not strike me with much force, in view of the fact that the argument is constantly made when tariff bills are under consideration that the wages in our industries are so high that we can not compete with the labor of the chief industrial countries of the world.

Mr. President, the point I am seeking to make, and it is the crux of the question under discussion, is that the bulk of immigration coming to this country in recent years is from the low-wage countries of Europe, where wages are much lower than in industrial countries like England and Germany, and when they come here they are not only willing to work for less, but they do work for less and live for less than the American laborer, and so they are displacing in the industries, where employed, the American labor, whether native or of the older immigrant class, reducing both the American standard of wage and living.

That these recent immigrants do underbid and are paid, in the industries employing them, less wages than the American is conclusively shown by the facts found by the Immigration Commission.

Undoubtedly the class of immigrants now coming here represents the cheapest labor of Europe, far cheaper than that of Germany and France, and, underbidding American labor, they are employed in the very industries that are complaining that they can not compete with Germany and France because of the low wage scale which obtains in those countries.
